TO HIS GRACE

The Duke of ARGYLL.

MY LORD DUKE.

SURROUNDED as your Grace is, not by the declared, but by the fecret and determined enemies of my innocent, permit me to add, my glorious child, I have but this one method, which necessity forces me to take, for bringing before you fome circumstances, and fome facts, which it is absolutely proper your Grace should be made acquainted with.

I would have preferred addressing this letter to you at your own house, but from sad experience, which I have purchased at a very high price, I was but too sure that any thing written by me, or by General Gunning's daughter, would not have found its way to your Grace's hands, without a prior inspection; and if, as it is very likely would have been the case, my ideas had not suited with those of the Inspector's, not without alterations. I do not, my Lord Duke, mean to make this affertion the subject of publick scrutiny or publick enquiry; but allow me to say, I can produce to your Grace incontestable proofs, that will convince you, whatever my situation may be, however I may have suffered, I would not advance a falsebood to disgrace my honourable and true defence.

Never have I been off my guard, never have my fears been hushed; my fenses have never sumbered when the peace or the happiness of my proud beart's darling has appeared to my anxious observation in any manner threatened or in danger; a deadly blow was aimed at both on Saturday evening, the 5th of February, and by means so treacherous, as at once to convince me every effort would be used to try if the appearance of guilt could by any art or machination, be fastened on as fair a same as ever yet has graced the annals of human nature.

Having

Having before had the honour of confulting your Grace confidentially, on the subject of this beloved object, who, I conceived, was almost as dear to you as to myself, my first wish was to see you, to tell you the discovery I had made, to ask your advice, and to be governed by it; with these intentions, the next day, February 6th, I had the honour of addressing a note to your Grace, requesting you would have the goodness to come to me. There was a circumstance fo particular that occurred from the answer I received, as determined me to go to Argyll-house that fame evening; for then I faw the mischief in a new and still more alarming point of view; I did go, but was informed your Grace had gone out in your carriage immediately after dinner, on particular bufiness; from that time I have been allowed no opportunity of feeing, fpeaking, or writing to you, or the events of Saturday, the 5th, and Sunday, the fixth of February, would not have been fo long concealed from your knowledge. My motives for laying them now before you are just, honest, and laudable; and I beg your patience my Lord Duke, whilft I faithfully explain them.

My intentions are to bring all that I know of this dark business, before the tribunal of your clear and unbiaffed judgement; to unfold as much as is in my power, the wonderful and monstrous arts and deceptions, formed, as if by magic, to raise a mist that has enveloped all our fenses, and for a time obscured the divine face of Truth; I mean, by telling you all I know, to put into your hands the thread of that clue, which may yet lead us through the labyrinths of error, and conduct us to the unincumbered plains of certainty. I know your Grace will follow this clue with avidity, whoever or whatever facrifices to bonour and to justice you may be obliged to make in the great undertaking.

I also know, and I acknowledge it with the bigbest sense of gratitude, that you have loved the innocent darling of my heart, and that you would never have pursued her to the very gates of destruction, if you had not been persuaded that she was no longer worthy of your affections: and by whom have you been imposed on to believe her guilty? My blood freezes with horror !!!

Search

Search for this mystery to the very deepest of its dark recess; spotless innocence has every thing to hope, and nothing to fear from the severest scrutiny of justice, Were the foes of my foul's treasure to be multiplied as the fand on the fea-shore, let them be dragged out from their lurking places, and face her in the broad light of honour; light is the enemy of vice, and the enemy of vice must ever be the friend of virtue. She has now, my Lord Duke, no protector but a very infirm mother, whom the Almighty, in his infinite mercy, has yet spared, and may still spare, for the sweet offices of maternal support and maternal tenderness; would your Grace but have the goodness to convince yourself how very worthy the is of your protection, her affaffins would be diffraced, and she restored to your kind heart in all her native truth, fimplicity, and unforfeited rectitude, more bright and more confpicuous for the fiery trials to which they have been exposed.

I have a letter in my possession, dated the 14th of January, not forged or anonymous; and it was the receipt of that letter directed to my daughter, and under cover to her maid, which brought me at so late an hour on the evening of the 14th, to your Grace's door at Ealing; I fent in a note to tell her I was there, and she came for a few minutes into the carriage with me; it was on the night preceding General Gunning's excursion into Dorsetsbire, that I had been alarmed not only for the peace, but for the fafety of my darling; my going to Ealing at an hour fo unreasonable, was with the design of bringing her away with me, but when she came into the chaife, though a little frightened at my fudden and unexpetted appearance, in all other respects, she was quite as composed, as unembarrassed, and as chearful as when I had parted from her four hours before; I own I felt aftonished, it was what I had no reason to expect; my mind, as if by sympathy, partook of ber calm, and not for worlds would I have disturbed her tranquillity, by telling her the treachery that was but then beginning to shew itself, and which has since burst in torrents, on the most artless of human beings. I, therefore, suppressed the contents of a letter that must have shocked ber as much as it has done me, and accounted to ber for the lateness of my visit, by faying, that I had been uneasy lest any accident might have happened, the horses and and servants not being returned, and that I could not sleep till I knew she was safe. I then asked her if she had met with any thing disagreeable since I saw her last? Her answer was exastly this, "The dear Duke is all goodness, you know his love for me, and I really think it encreases every time I see him." This was a most satisfactory and certain contradiction of the contents of the letter I then had about me, and which, if exposed, must cover the writer of it with confusion.

I beg your Grace's permission to make one observation more, before I bring you forward to Saturday, the 5th of February; I had written certain letters on a certain subject; the writing and sending of those letters had been done, consulting only the feelings, or, perhaps, I may more properly say, the passions of a mother, truly sensible of the rich gem Providence has intrusted to her care, a care doubly interesting, as he who should have sheltered and guarded this treasure with manly firmness, had quitted the endearing post that nature had assigned to him. I am thankful that your Grace, when the copies of those B 4 letters were put into your hands, gave him the opportunity of reading them, who well knew he might not only have inspected them before they were fent out of his house, but that he might even have prevailed on me to have suppressed them, had he not prior to that period, forfeited every pretention to my confidence, particularly on that subject on which they were written. Yes, my Lord, I am flattered with this mark of your approbation, for had not the intention, at least, of my writing them been approved of by your Grace, you would not have exposed them to bis inspection; from that time his behaviour to me was tee contemptuous, too expressive of abhorrence, for me to delineate. One instance only it is necessary I should not omit; feveral days preceding that most memorable one, on which he drove from her natural home his unoffending daughter, with diffrace by bimfelf affixed on her spotless character, he had ordered me to withdraw from bis house, and the consequence of this vindictive command was, the reducing ber in whose presence it was announced, to such extremity, from fits which held her upwards of two hours, that I verily believed would have have put an end to her existence. On this as on all other occasions, the tenderness of a mother conquered the refentment of a wife : to fave the life of all that was dear to me in life, I made concessions, that had they proceeded from less interesting motives, would have been too great a condescension for innocence to have offered as a compromise to guilt. I promised him all that be demanded. when he faw the advantage he had gained over me, by the fituation into which he had thrown his angel child; I faid I would take no more steps for ber security whilf I remained under bis roof. For he faid he would separate us. and I have religiously kept my word for the time mentioned by bimfelf, though extorted from me by cruelty.

At present I shall close the beart-rending subject, I wish I could say for ever, but it must again be taken up in another part of this letter with attendant circumstances, which I will venture to affirm have never yet been represented to your Grace in the language of truth, and for my own sake, in no other will I present them before you. Having quitted a subject which can have excited in your Grace of girls and a management !

Grace no other sentiment but that of borror, my next, if I am not a very inadequate painter, will produce a different effect, for, when the insignificancy of folly unites itself to the will and wish of executing such forts of mischief, as requires a something like wisdom to perform with address and with success, it places the aukward perpetrators in a situation equal with insamy, but below contempt,

Mr. and Mrs. Bowen will forgive me if I have not faid enough, but I never flatter; besides the picture I am drawing is a family piece. I excuse myself from entering on the genealogy of Mr. Bowen, because it does not concern me to inquire into it, but I conceive that bis birth-place will not, like that of Homer, ever be disputed, except, indeed, fuch a country could be found in the wide map of the world, where every thing in nature is reversed, where the actions of men are great and good in proportion as they are base and wicked; where dishonour is called bonour, and cunning affumes the name of wisdom. In such a country Mr. Bowen may expect to wear the laurels of a bero, and'to receive the canonization of a faint,

This man of words, and this woman of deeds, who about three years ago had united themselves and evil dispositions, by the ties of marriage, in one bundle of iniquity, I had heard nothing of from that time until October last, when their coufin, General Gunning, was able to inform me that they were in lodgings at Kenfington, How he acquired his knowledge I am yet to learn, as no correspondence between the families had been kept up; he had never seen Mr. Bowen, and as he then told me, Mrs. Bowen was confined to her house by indisposition, yet, he had been to visit them. The part they have since taken in all bis designs will leave no doubt on my mind from what motives they were brought first to Kensington, and afterwards removed to London. The reward held up to these additional engineers, I suppose, at least in promises, has not been inconsiderable, and for what a paltry confideration have they laid hold of all fuch bonourable advantages? The Mahometans fay women have no fouls; and I believe that Mrs. Bowen is in this respect a perfett Mahometan, therefore, like a gambler who has nothing to lofe, she has a fort of licence to play what stake she pleases. what what can I say for her husband, our military friend? So very equal is their merit, that I cannot determine which of the two is most intitled to my gratitude, for having used their best endeavours to render me not the most happy, but the most miserable of wives, of mothers, and of women; I say their endeavours, for there is a good Providence, who like a good architest, will level in the dust every superstructure that has been erected on a rotten or a suspected foundation.

I may have intruded on your patience, my Lord Duke, and I may also have expressed myself with more warmth than propriety in general allows to my sex, but when your Grace is pleased to consider that this gentleman and this gentleman have condescended to bring themselves forward with a groom, and perhaps other suborned witnesses, for many more there may be of the same description, and for the purpose of desamation; when you consider that they and their canail associates are abetted and supported by the ambushed enemies of innocence and purity, who from their concealed situations push forward those poor mercenaries, to answer not only for the

the execution but for the defigning their WORKS OF DARKNESS. I fay, when your Grace confiders these truths, you will not only pardon my prolixity, but pity me for what I bave not faid, as I am contented to conceal much more that I have declared, and from motives. which, if understood, you, my Lord, would not condemn or disapprove. My temper is not fulceptible of strong refentment on common occasions, the tryal I am now supporting is not a common one, and though it has not destroyed, it certainly has disturbed my tranquillity; there was but one possible way to effect the destruction of my peace, for even the death of my daughter would not have accomplished it; I should have felt like a mother, I should have grieved like a mother, but my grief would have partaken more of pleasure than of pain; under this natural affliction, I should every moment, after I had loft her fweet fociety, have looked forward with perfect relignation to the will of my God, for the joyful fummons, when in his goodness he would again reunite me to her, and to another who has gone before ber. Thousands have been recalled in the marning of their existence, few more prepared for such a change: shore in number as her days have been, they are not unmarked with religious, moral, and focial duties. I had nothing to fear for the fairness of ber accounts, whenever she should be called upon to render them up to her Maker, and may that Omnipotent Power, whose mercies are infinite, but whose justice is aweful, condemn or acquit her and me of all our faults at the last day, by the guilt or by the innocence of our bearts and of our actions, regarding what have been laid to our charge by the ENEMIES of VIRTUE and of HONOUR. I have faid there was but one possible way by which my peace could have been destroyed. Your Grace, from the goodness of your own heart, would not fail to understand my meaning, though I was not to explain it, by avowing that had a fingle fpeck of that mass of accusation brought against my beloved child, really proceeded from her own conduct, then and then only should I have felt and have confessed myself the most disgraced, and most wretched of human beings. Whereas, the arts that have been used to bring this fate upon me, I mean, to deceive me into a belief that it was come upon me, has had an effect quite different from

from what was intended; and I have more transport in the trials her innocence has so gloriously sustained, and more pride in the bonourable title of ber mother, than any other cause for joy could have brought me; nor could my ambition have received so ecstatic a gratification, if by a miracle I had been raised to a first rank in the peerage, as I now feel, whilst I have the honour to assure your Grace I AM A HAPPY MOTHER.

I must now condescend to speak once more of Bowen and his wife, though there is no place assigned them in the book of precedence, yet I cannot be very wrong in bestowing one mark of respect on such confequential characters; I shall therefore, through courtesy, bring them forward before General Gunning's Groom, who is connected with themselves in a business, not that of cleaning borses, it would be fortunate for them if it was not of a more dirty nature.

To the best of my recollection, this Bowen and his wife have been removed from their lodgings at Kensington, to a lodging in Queen-street, May-fair, since the beginning of January. While they were at Kensington I went

I went several times to enquire after the health of this mest treatherous woman; she was, or pretended to be, exceedingly ill, and I being really ill, saw her but once at that house, not being able to get out of my carriage, and twice she dined with us in St. James's-Place.

Captain Bowen I had never feen but once, and that before his marriage had taken place with Miss Lyster, which was in consequence of the follicitations of General Gunning and the lady's parents, to try if I could prevail on them to give up the thoughts of an union, unpleasant to her father and mother; without accomplishing their wishes, I have reason to believe I created for myfelf bitter and revenerful enemies. Yet I had then no cause to suppose they did not take, as sure it ought to have been taken, my opinion merely, and delivered with as much tenderness as if addreffed to my own darling child. They feemed convinced by it; but an elopement, or rather a private marriage, that took place a few weeks afterwards, convinced me, if they bad gratitude, they wanted wisdom. faw Mrs. Bowen, three years after at Kenfington, the appeared terrified at having incurred my anger, by a breach of the promise fhe

The had made her parents through me. When I met her first at Bath, for it was there she picked up her specious husband, I assured her, and with that sincerity from which I never depart, that however, in offending against her first duties, she might have given pain or displeasure to me, she must take my visit to her as the proof of a perfect reconciliation on my part. She kissed my hands, and her professions of assection and gratitude were boundless.

Many visits Mr. Bowen made General Gunning in his own apartment, after my interview with his wife; and fometimes he came into the room where I fat, to ask me how I did. On those occasions he had the art to impose so completely on my judgement, that I have often told them both, I should never have forgiven myself had the office that was forced upon me succeeded, and I bad been the means of preventing her from being the wife of fo good a man and fo amiable a husband. I even pressed her, as fhe had a fmall estate in her power, not to omit for a day, to make a will in favour of a man, who had, by his deep bypocrify, gained in a very short time so much upon my my good opinion: And I proposed to them. that I would with their permission, write to her father, and endeavour to bring about a reconciliation between him and them; but before I could put my friendly definer into execution the mask was thrown aside, and the semblance of every virtue that had attracted my partiality, gave place to an opposite vice. The transition was so sudden and unexpelled, that I was not prepared to meet or oppose the plans that for many months, and long before these new agents could have been employed, had, with all the ingenuity of wickedness, been fecretly carrying on to blaft my fondest hopes, and to bury them beneath the ruins of maternal pride and maternal happiness. You, my Lord, though most friendlily, and most innocently, was the occasion of my being at the time I speak of thrown off my guard, and lulled into a fecurity, that might have been more fatal than God has permitted it should be. Yes! my Lord, it was your avowed protection of my beart's treasure, when I too well knew the would find no protetter in her father , it was your expressions of paternal love for ber, in the notes we had the honour of receiving from your Grace, that made me suppose her her placed beyond the reach of those poisoned darts that I knew were concealed in the bosoms of many, and some of whom she called her friends; and I knew too, that they only waited for a moment favourable to assassination, before they discharged them on their artless vision.

Oh, my Lord! Why have you deferted the trust I bad reposed in you? You have been deceived : but should you have suffered yourself to be deceived? You, who have known her heart for so many years, even from her earliest infancy, to you I appeal, have you ever perceived any thing, like wickedness or fraud in the constitution of ber mind? How bumiliating the question! An honest slave would think it derogatory to his bonour, and would blush to ask it! yet it is the mother of a persecuted child, who is the pride, the boast, and the support of her life, that does propose this question, and proposes it with confidence. that your Grace will in justice acknowledge. that until that fatal morning, the ninth of this month, ever to be commemorated, for the unnatural crimes that have marked its progress, she never gave you cause to accuse her even of those little feibles, to which young people people are sometimes subject; and now, not only the blackest, but the meanest of all charges has been brought against her.

There is a gradation in wickedness, my Lord. Can a young creature, just turned of twenty-one, who has been the glory of her family, beloved by her friends, revered by her acquaintance, adored by the children of poverty, and the sweet soother of distress, wherever or whenever it made its claim upon her gentle heart, in palaces or in cottages, in robes or in rags, still as it was in distress, the whole large stock of her sympathetick kindness was ever open to its demands:

Can a young creature who deserves this character, and that she does deserve it, there are many animated witnesses besides her filent actions, which have been uniformly good and virtuous, from the earliest dawn of reason to the present hour of her affliction: Can such a being as this, be supposed in a few short months to forfeit all pretensions even to common honesty, and I may add, to common sense? If she had been the very wretch she is represented to be, her understanding would have prevented her from making making choice of a fool, for the confident of her forgeries: and what end were these forgeries to answer? I cannot comprehend it!!!

You are deceived, my Lord, indeed you are deceived. For your own sake, for the sake of my injured darling, who still bonours, still loves you, and sighs to be again acknowledged by you, to be restored to your unbiassed affection, for all our sakes, get at the bottom of this borrid mystery; for till you have the goodness, by taking some pains and some trouble, to convince yourself of her perfest innocence, though every tongue besides your own should proclaim it, she bids me assure your Grace, she shall not think herself sufficiently exculpated from her imputed guilt, to appear before you.

Had the author of ber disgrace, and your deception, been of any other description than what, to the shame of buman nature be is, and you could for a moment have believed her guilty on any less authority, than that which must have staggered faith itself, in such a case, she must have ranked you amongst her enemies, who, in whatever situation she is placed.

placed, either reduced below, or restored to, her sormer affluence, will never be permitted to approach her. The words not permitted to approach ber, I am persuaded will be exceptionable to some of my own sex, who partly compose the circle of very high sastion; but I beg it may be understood by them as my apology for using it on this occasion.

Honour, although with dignified bumility, delights in performing for ber fervants the least of those offices belonging to her own department; yet is Honour also jealous, subject to anger, of extreme baughtines; and, when offended or infulted, will dispute ber title to homage with ladies of the first rank, and very first pretensions; I mean only such who, depending on their own strength, have invidiously or openly declared themselves ber enemies, and the enemies of Truth. This is a little sketch only, of my mistres's disposition; to call Honour my mistress has been, and ever will be, my boaft and my glory. I have served her truely and faithfully; I know all her laws and follow them; there is nothing fo dear to me as fbe is; I would rather facrifice my child than injure Honour. But God be praifed! I have never been brought ta and the duties I perform in the service of Honour, are the stronger for being anited.

The pride of Honour does not refemble female pride, it is quite a different fort of fentiment; nor is ber anger like the anger of fine ladies tinctured with revenge. If the face of Honour has been concealed from her friends by the malice of her foes, and it bappens that one of the dearest of her friends, deceived by appearance, should believe this vision to be Guilt, disguised in the habits of Honour, and under fuch a deception, he should have aimed a blow at the vitals of Honour, the would have immediately unveiled ber face; fbe would have said, what in the name of my daughter, I have now the bonour to fay to your Grace, " It was not me you affassinated, it was Guilt you meant to punish."

From the beginning of the present month so many events have taken place, that I must apply to my own memorandums, which I regularly and daily made, to lay before your Grace such facts as occurred to my everwatchful observation. My suspicions of C 4 General

General Gunning's intentions to impede the happiness of his daughter, were from the date on which I shall take up the affair. No longer suspicious, bis conduct had explained them into certainties; but to what extent he meant to carry his devices, I had not the most distant idea. How could it possibly enter into the imagination of one parent, that another would have gone the desperate lengths that other has since gone? A furmise of the kind would have been criminal, it would have been an offence against nature! and could not have proceeded from any heart but that impenetrable one, whose owner has persisted in his cruel machinations with an effrontery, for which humanity bas no precedent! - I turn with horror from the fubject!!!

MEMORANDUM I.

Feb. 2. "Between eleven and twelve this morning, General Gunning has fent off his groom with a letter, to the _____ of ____, which letter he has written in his dreffing-room, but has not shewn the contents to any of his family."

On this first memorandum, my Lord, I shall take the liberty to observe, that I have omitted, and from motives that none of the parties concerned will disapprove, to mention the name of the respectable personage to whom the letter was sent, or into what county, your Grace being already acquainted with the particulars I have suppressed.

My next observation on the above memorandum is, that the groom who was fent with the letter is not looked upon as a family servant; he eats and sleeps in the house, but lives by day with his horses at the livery-stable, sometimes attending bis master in his rides, and sometimes any lady whe bappens to be under General Gunning's pro-I have not feen this man more than three times fince his mafter brought him back from Ireland in May laft, where he had attended him with other fervants; and have never spoke to him but to ask him about his wife and children, who being left in a diftant part of the country, compassion had instigated me to keep from starving. I have too much pride to fay any thing of my daughter's knowledge of this wretch. nation's table."

MEMORANDUM II.

Feb. 3. Nine o'Clock at night. "General Gunning's groom is just now returned from —; he brought back a letter for his master; I sent for it, examined the direction and the feal. Captain and Mrs. Bowen, my daughter, and sister, were present. I told them fome tricks had certainly been played with the letter, and pointed out to their observation, that the coronet was reversed in the sealing it, and that instead of St. James's, it was written on the direction St. James Place. I then gave it to the ferwant to lay it on his master's table, for General Gunning was not at home.

floated on my ideas; I fent for the letter a second time, re-examined it, and then returned it to his dressing-room by the same servant; the whole time, both first and last, that this letter was detained by us, did not amount to five minutes, nor did the servant, who brought it to and carried it from the drawing-room, quit the room till I sent it down by him to be laid on his master's table."

With

With your Grace's permission, I shall as I proceed continue to make my observations on what has gone before, article by article. I am not writing for fame, I write for more than life or fame: my pen and my beart are employed in the vindication of injured, of oppressed innocence; that Innocent, my own my only, my beloved child. I address myself to the senses, and to all the amiable passions that distinguish the buman from the brate creation; I write to convince, and not to gain applause.

The letter which General Gunning's groom brought from _____, has been faid, and faid too by ber father, to have been one distated and written by my daughter, for the purpose of imposition. This accusation amounts to the direct charge of forgery, deceit, and a species of vanity, that, I should suppose, could never have entered a semale breast, where the door of folly as well as of vice, had not stood open to receive it, Laying aside for the present, that folemn attestation my angel has condescended in more than a common form to make, of her intire innocence of this diabolical charge, let us, my Lord, consider it over cooly and dispassion nately, that those, if any such there are, who will not be convinced by a proof, of which religion cannot produce a stronger test, may be persuaded they have been in an error by the infallible evidence of their own judgement. A copy of the assidavit, sworn before one of his Majesty's justices of the peace, shall be assixed to this letter; and for this reason, that by your Grace's silence on the occasion, it is impossible to suppose, though sent to Argyllhouse, the day on which it was executed, that it has ever been permitted to reach your hands.

Allow me, my Lord, to return again to the subject of my enquiries; and I shall begin with asking your Grace, if on your conscience you think, that supposing my daughter, or I, or both together, had framed, forged, and sent this letter, which was on the groom's return to be delivered by him, as coming from the ______ of _____, that I should have ordered it to be brought up to me, and before company; that I should be the sirst to discover there bad been a fraud committed; or that in pointing it out to my daughter's observation, which I did, that she should have coincided with me in opinion; for if the bad been guilty and I innocent, or suppose us both culpable, wickedness and folly. do not always go hand in hand; furely had we been the authors of the fraud, we were not necessitated to impeach ourselves, we need not have commanded back the letter. after having once dismissed it, and a second time have examined the feal and the direction with all the scrutiny of a too well authorized fuspicion. Should we have done this, my Lord? Should we have put this disputed letter into the hands of Bowen and his wife, to help us in detecting the fraud, if it must have fallen on our own heads? I did give it to those wretches for their opinion; was there any thing like guilt in all this? Common fense says no. But common sense, nor common honesty has had any thing to do in the whole transaction of an affair, marked only by folly and by infamy.

Perhaps it may not be improper before I proceed further on this article, to explain my reasons why I sent for the letter to be brought up to me, when the groom returned from _____ or any other place, for his employers and himself are the only people who can tell where he really had been sent. Why I ordered ordered this letter, and why I inspected the feal and the direction with the scrutinizing eyes of suspicion, would, were I to speak to every reason, and to every proof that I can produce, be of themselves sufficient to fill a volume, every page of which would be more mysterious, and more wonderful than another. I shall, therefore, content myself with averring to your Grace, that no letter, fince last May, has come to me either by the post or by a stage-coach, for I have tryed the conveyance of both, but what has been cut across the feal, with a hot knife, before I got them. This very day, being the 22d of February, I have received a parcel from Hampshire, in which was inclosed a letter, it came by the coach, and the feal cut across as ufual.

It may also be necessary before I entirely dismiss the subject of my observations on Memorandum the first, that I should make some addition to those I have already stated. I suppose your Grace has heard my darling accused of bribing her father's groom, as well as of her employing him in the conveyance of her forgeries. Had she forged the letter from the of bad she prevented the groom from going to bad she prevented she

the feduced him from the obedience due so his mafter, no doubt a descent from the fummit of honour, which had fo many years been her residence, must have been attended with some difficulties, and in such an incumbered path, and to so young a traveller, who had never before explored the beaten but intricate mazes of deception, she would have found no means of pursuing her journey without the aid of that conductor whose affistance on fuch occasions cannot be dispensed with. Where a groom is made useful to intrigues of policy, this bagatelle may be admitted. That without a bribe there can be no corruption. and without money there can be no bribe. That the never has been possessed of money fufficient for fueb undertakings, is not in her disfavour; she has ever had something for the aid of goodness, but nothing for the support or purposes of vice.

Again, my Lord, permit me to alk your Grace another question; by what magic she got possession of a seal, with the coronet and arms of that family on whom it is alledged she has committed this despicable fraud; how came she by the coronet and cypher of another honourable branch of that most honourable house?

house? From any part of either family the could not even have procured the impressions of those feals, because, the does not know any but the principals of the family. But admit a possibility of her having by some means or other not to be accounted for, got the impressions of them, for I have not yet heard that my angel has been accused of absolutely stealing the seals themselves: What a theme is this for a mother's pen! Yet it does not bumble me; on the contrary, I never till now, have known the extent of my own confequence; and though always proud of my treasure, never have I been half so proud as during the time of her unmerited and unbeard of trials: it is to them I owe the discovery of a thousand of those perfections of the foul, that adversity, and adversity only can call into action.

No, my Lord, amongst all the meannesses of which she has been supposed the author, they do not say that she had possessed herself of the real seals belonging to the house of ______. But, as I have said before, admit there was a possibility of her procuring the impressions of those seals, where would have been her advantage? She was not an engraver, engraver, that the could cut them ben felf that if any fuch have been cut for the occasion, it must have been by an engraver, and in that case I should imagine it not a very difficult matter for your Grace to trace out who did cut them, and by whose orders they were cut. The deeper you have the goodness to dive in this ocean of ingleries, the greater probability there is that at last you will drag up from the bottom of it. the real workers of this iniquitous bufiness; conviction must follow your researches; the weight that cannot fail to oppress your mind will be removed, you will rejoice in her innocence, though you should feel a pang that it has been fo long and so cruelly tortured.

In the course of this letter, my Lord, I have often given the clue into your Grace's hand. You well know what my sentiments have long been, and I sincerely wish to avoid every publick explanation that does not immediately tend to effectually remove not only the imputation of crimes, but the smallest blemish, that has been wantonly ascribed to a character immutable as truth, and immaculate as infancy; not a specifical be sufficient to remain. will facrifice nothing to hate or to revenge, but every thing to affaffinated honour and perfecuted goodness; had I nearer ties than nature, or the laws have instituted, I would break through them all on an occasion like this. She, who would joyfully lay down her life in the cause she has undertaken, can she be an uninterested, a meer looker-on, and see the dearest of all her soul holds dear made a vision to the arts and stratagems of an insidious——? add, my Lord, the name that must fill up this horrid blank—for you know it.

On the night the D- of -s letter was brought by General Gunning's groom, as it was supposed from B-m, his master did not return from his evening amusements 'till about one o'clock; does it not strike your Grace as at least a remarkable circumstance, that at such a time as this, on which I may almost fay the happiness of his only child in a manner was depending, (for, if he had written the letter which be says he did write to the D-of --- how much of his, of her's, and of my happines, must inevitably have hung on the answer he should have the honour to receive from his G-?) and when he knew this answer was to be received that very evening, I ask, if it was not rather Arange Trange that he should choose to sup from home! that he should be as indifferent to the return of his messenger as if be was in no manner concerned about the business on which he had fent him to B-m, and though he faid in his family that he expetted his groom back at eight o'clock, that he should afterwards stay out himself 'till one, and not leave orders to have this important letter fent to him, either in Harley-street or Sobo-Square, for to one or other of those places all his evenings were dedicated; nor did he once fend his fervant to St. James's-Place to enquire if the groom was come back; which feems to argue a fort of apathy be is not at all liable to on other occasions; neither is he deficient in curiofity; and had the contents of the expected letter been entirely new to him, I am perfuaded it would not have remained on his dreffing table from nine 'till one o'clock, like an old book, the subject of which he was perfett master of; or more properly I might have faid like a book of which be knew himself to be the author, or at least one of the authors.

My bed room was next the street, the knocking at the door when he came home awakened me; I heard him get out of the carriage, carriage, and it drove off; in another minute the hall-door was opened with great caution ; it arrested my attention, and immediately after a coach drove into the place; I heard the step let down, and it drove back again most furiously; there was nobody up in the house at this time but his own man, whom he charged not to fay he was gone out, if any enquiries should be made. I found afterwards that he went to Argyll-house with the disputed-or for brevity sake you must allow me to call it bis, or their's, or any body's letter, and that he left it with your Grace; that he was in your apartment on that night, I do not mean as information, but, perhaps, my Lord, you do not also know that it was not for your Grace that he first enquired ; no! it was for two others in your family, but all were gone to bed, and then he was shown to your Grace's room.

The fervant waited his mafter's return in the porter's hall, the door was opened without knocking, and he went up to his chamber fo foftly as not to be heard by any body but myself. The groom slept in a garret immediately over my room, and after General Gunning was in bed, I heard his man go up to the groom, and their voices too I could hear very distinctly. The message, as I am informed, that he carried to this wretch from his master was to charge him not to say any thing about B——, or his journey to that place, until he had seen him, and orders that he should come next morning to his bed-side by seven o'clock,

MEMORANDUM III.

Feb. 4. "General Gunning was in my daughter's room this morning before she was up, and informed her he had reserved a charming letter from the D— of———, which he had left with the Duke of Argyll, and also told her he had been last night at. Argyll-house for that purpose, and would D 2 take take her with him there, that she might see it as foon as the was dreffed. She has been at Argyll-house for that purpose, and this most charming letter has been shewn to her, and my heart partakes in her joy, though I have not feen the contents; but she has repeated them to me as nearly as the can remember them. I am as much transported with her happiness as if I had; and (as her mother) I ought to have been consulted on every step that has been taken; but should General Gunning really mean to act now fairly by my heart's treasure, if he no longer works under ground to impede her felicity, I will forgive all his past reserves, although under the feverity of their pressure I have been fuffering the pains of torture for fo many months .- If he is not conscious that his wishes are opposed to my wishes, on a point where both should be equally interested, why does he throw out so many dark hints, and never speak to me with confidence or kindness? why not shew the D- of --- 's letter to me, if every thing is really coming to a erifis ?- There is yet a darkness in his conduct that I do not comprehend. Another circumftance gives me suspicion; -he has been

this day examining the fervant who brought the letter up stairs, very closely, whether we looked much at the seal, and at the direction, and how long we kept it the first and second time that we fent for it.—Surely he knows me too well, not to know that I should on no occasion condescend to open any letter that was not directed to myself—what then can he mean by being so inquisitive?—'tis very odd—I do not like it—I have been so long in a scene of mysteries, of which he is the artisseer, that I never expect to get out of them as long as I live!"

These, my Lord Duke, are the whole contents of my third memorandum; you know at that time, and long before, what had been my fears, my sufferings, and my sorrows; and with what watchful caution I observed and followed the intricate and retrogade motions that threatened the blow, when it only shewed itself at a distance. I appeal only to truths, and to your Grace, in this my just, upright, and honest vindication; it is only the consideration of its being just, upright, and bonest, that supports and enables me to enter upon, and shall carry me through an undertaking, fing situations, as a wife and a mother, I hope bas never fallen to the lot of any woman until it became my own. I can have no choice how I am to act when I ask myself this question—shall I protect goodness, or shall I leave it to the destruction of evil? Promises and threats have not been omitted to turn me from my determined purposes; what these promises and threats are composed of shall appear before I finish the painful task necessity has imposed on me, as an indispensible duty.

I do not think it necessary, my Lord, to annex my animadversions on the contents of my third memorandum, because the only observations I could now make, were made by me at the time the circumstances occurred; I beg your Grace to honour the perusal of them with a moment of serious consideration; recollect also the situation of my mind, for you know what it was when I saw the storm only at a distance, and long before it bursted like forked lightening on our defence-less heads.—You know, my Lord, how beavily I have been oppressed by the borrors of suf-pence and apprehensions, and that my apprebenfions were not the growth of a day, a week, or a month, I had long looked into that mind, which has fince taught its possessor to realize what before was fulpicion, into a dark, a dreadful certainty. I repeat it, my Lord Duke, that you know how great was my contien, how indefatigable my researches; for to your Grace, at different times, I have revealed in writing every thought of my heart. Your extreme fondness for my amiable child, and the tender interest you was taking in whatever concerned the establishment of her happiness, invited me to the freedom of repoling in your Grace my most unlimited confidence; an honour you permitted me, and did not feem displeased at my using this your indulgence on all critical occasions. I am at last arrived to memorandum the fourthan inonce or some, now and a store

On the evening of which day, the plots of my daughter's enemies and my own had opened, on my understanding, so largely, and oppressed my heart so beavily, that, when I threw my thoughts as usual on paper, it was only in these words.

MEMORANDUM IV.

Feb. 5. "This day has opened a scene of premeditated villainy, the agents of which are Bowen and his wife; and such a conversation has passed between that Woman and myself, as I shall not notice here, being impressed upon my memory, and never to be erased from thence."

Before I have the honour of bringing forward circumstantially as I mean to do, the events of Saturday the 5th of February, I shall, with your Grace's permission, explain to you on what fort of footing those Bowens were received into my family, and how artfully they maintained their posts until it wat conpenient for their destructive measures to throw off their disguise, and to disclose themselves in their real and monstrous forms. I would have used instead of real the term natural, but nature would have blushed had I profaned ber name, by bestowing it on such people, or annexing it to such unnatural purposes!!!

Removing themselves, or what is still more likely, being removed by others from Kenfington to London, the better to accomplish the work of wickedness they have submitted to be employed upon, they fignified to me the day they should come to town; I forget what day it was, and only remember, that is was early in the month of January, and that they called in St. James's-Place immediately on their arrival.-From that time, until they forung the mine of all their mischiefs, I behaved to them with every posfible kindnels, whilft General Gunning appeared to treat them with that acknowledgeing fort of negligence, that can hardly be tortured into the term civility, but will eafily admit of another word, and one that for ever must belong to the whole committee of perjures affociates, I mean contempt. This fludied conduct produced all its effects. I redoubled my attentions, and, thrown off my guard, I fuffered myself to be deceived by their artful contrivance, and really in my own thoughts blamed General Gunning for that want of kindness to his relations, which I endeavoured to atone for by the friendship with which I always received them.—How artfully was conducted the Tragedy they were engaged in, and how well supported were all their parts! Bowen's wife once gave General Gunning very spirited, and I thought a very proper rebuke, for his having called (as she chose to say) at their door, without enquiring if they were at home. Before this I thought her a tame foolish woman, but I now changed my opinion; in short, for some weeks I was the dupe of them all, nor do I charge myself with want of penetration that I was deceived, for in all the mysterious and ingenious devices of which they have been the contrivers, this is the only one that appears to me to have been carried on with even common understanding, though of uncommon cunning and uncommon villainy there has been no desciency.

Mrs. Bowen is remarkable for one accomplishment, I mean her masterly performance on the harpsicord; and my daughter, about a fortnight before she was driven from St. James's-Place, having engaged Signior Quilici to instruct her in singing, embraced with pleasure this woman's offer to accompany her, and give her lessons in the absence of her master; nobody was more capable of improving a learner in that science than herself; her singers command the sweetest sounds of harmony, but it proceeds from her singers enly, it has nothing to do with that fort of musick musick so elegantly distinguished by Shakspeare, it is quite of another description; the soul has no connection with the powers she possesses.

When I wished Mr. and Mrs. Bowen to dine with us, we either called at the door of her lodgings to take her up, or else sent the carriage to fetch her, and after supper the generally went home in my daughter's chair. I shall not dwell longer on this subject, it is quite enough that my daughter's attestation, subjoined to this letter, will sufficiently elucidate to every man and every woman, who would not themselves be guilty of perjury, what was the nature of her acquaintance with this difgraceful character, for a difgrace the is to her fex, to religion, and to bumanity. I shall now have the gratification of prefenting to your Grace these incomparable Machiavelians in the plain unimbellifbed livery of truth. ompany

Saturday, Feb 5. My Sifter, my Darling, and myfelf, returning about three o'clock from the Park, called at Mrs. Bowen's house, and sent up a message to ask if they would dine with us; the wife came down and placed herself in the carriage, making an apology for her bustand, who she said was gone into the country, or would have been very happy to have accepted my invitation.—The time before dinner was as usual passed at the Piano Forte; the musical assassin playing, and the innocent victim singing, or, rather I should have said, attempting to sing.

General Gunning dined at home that day a I did not go down to dinner, nor had I done fo for feveral days before, being exceedingly ill and languid: the ladies came up to me about seven o'clock, leaving General Gunning below, and the carriage waiting to earry him out: we had not been together more than ten minutes, when Mr. Bowen joined us in the drawing-room: I told him I was forry we had not the pleasure of his company at dinner: his reply was, that he had been in the city! and I faid, without any meaning, Mrs. Bowen informed me you was gone into the country: he fmiled, and replied, he had been to far into the city that it may be almost called the country. Soon after a meffage was brought up to Mr. Bowen from General Gunning, with his compliments, and that he wished to speak to him: when he came back to us, which was in a few minutes, I fignia

I fignified that I was alarmed at the meffage and begged he would tell me what General Gunning had wanted with him, for I had then fears of a very ferious nature. After fome helitation, he faid it was only to alk him for five guineas, it being too late to fend to his banker. I shook my head, and told him I did not believe a word of the matter; for that two days before I had feen him take out of his pocket a letter, at least what I thought was a letter, but on its being opened I had observed that it contained a number of bank bills, and that the envelope was blank paper. Mr. Bowen affured me apon bis bonour, which at that time I had no reason to doubt was sterling honour, that he had told me the real business for which he was called down, and I was fatisfied. General Gunning foon after went out to his evening appointments; my fweet injured Angel was gone to fet an hour with her beloved Protectres the Duchels of B- Mrs. Bowen at her mulick, my lifter and Mr. Bowen playing at picquet, and myfelf at work: we were thus disposed of, when Mrs. Bowen, tiling hastily, and taking up a candle, looked at my fifter as if the would have faid follow me; the hint, though loft on me, was understood tinderstood by the person to whom it was directed; fhe laid down her cards; made an apology to Mr. Bowen, and went out of the room; it was more than a quarter of an hour before they came back again; and looking in their faces I faw confusion in that of the most treacherous of women; though a good deal concealed by the convenient black curtain that in part covered the erimfon of guilt from my inspection; whilst the pale and agitated countenance of my fifter fpoke the plain truth, and told me in language 1 could not misunderstand fomething disagreeable bad happened; hardly had I time to recollect myfelf, before Mrs. Bowen proposed to her husband that he should go for an hour to the coffee-house, and return to us again. The plan being laid before the Incendiaries met in St. James's-Place, they perfettly understood each other, and taking up his hat he disappeared; when my fister said it would be highly proper Mrs. Bowen that you should now repeat to Mrs. Gunning what you have been telling me. For God's fake, faid I. what is the matter! Do not alarm yourfelf, my fifter replied; Mrs. Bowen will tell you all; some devil has been forging a letter to ber in the name of our darling here. I must observe, that I never beheld such expressions of guilt and confusion as overwhelmed the wretch before me; for though I was by no means free from agitation, I fixed my eyes on her face, whilst I requested her not to keep me in sufpence; I repeated my intreaties so often, that at last with a seeming reluctance, and seeming tenderness, she opened the diabolical commission.

"have been deceived! you are cheated! you are abused! and I fear, when you know all, it will kill you; it will be the death of you. I owe you more than my mother, and I love you better than I loved ther; how then can I kill you by telling you, your daughter is a wretch!"

Had I been less acquainted with that heart, which I have the glory to say, under the goodness of God, has been of my own forming, had I not been the conductor of all her actions, and the Repositor of all her thoughts—Had I not been the joyful witness of a life of purity, bonour, and restitude, passed under my own immediate inspection, and which had not even been marked with the

the common failings of her fex-had I not felt that I should have been content that my own foul should have answered for her transgreffions, I might, as this affaffin threatened, and very probably I should, have fallen the instant martyr of her devices. On the contrary, I now with the most undisturbed composure assured her it was she that had been imposed upon, and begged she would proceed with as much calmness to relate as I was prepared to liften; that she had nothing to fear on my account, either for my life or for my repose, from the consequences of dry intelligence she could possibly give me. Whilst I was faying this I observed her looks, which, contrary to their usual filence, spoke some fort of meaning, and which I have fince construed into the language of mortification, on finding this her first essay had met with so little success; however, encouraged I suppose by the mildness of my manner to ber, and by my telling her she had been imposed upon, she returned to her charge, and taking shelter behind the banner of honest meaning, under its folen colours, she tryed to conceal the real baseness of her intentions. With effrontery never to be equalled on fuch an occafion, the Crocodile caught hold of my hands, often over them, lamenting that to fave me from further imposition, she must facrifice my daughter. Mr. Bowen and herself, she said, had been nearly distrasted on my account, by the knowledge they had come at of the double part the wicked creature was acting—There was now nothing I so much wished for after this glimpse of the business as to get to the very bottom of it; I therefore concealed my resentment, and desired her to explain what she meant, that by the nature of her accusations I might be able to form my own opinion.

In consideration, my Lord Duke, of the heavy tax I am going to lay on your patience, I would willingly give your Grace the fubflance only of this Woman's information, but in justice to all the parties that are concerned, or may concern themselves in or about the iniquitous transactions, that are the subject of this letter, however tedious I am forced to be, I must, to throw a light on darkness like this, be clear and explicit, and bring every circumstance that I am acquainted with before your Grace plain and unaltered.

The

The calmness with which I made my request to Mrs. Bowen, that she would proceed with her information, took off from her every fear of my displeasure, and with all the affurance of guilt the began to inforce what the had before advanced. My dearest Mrs. Gunning, faid the, bow dreadfully have you been imposed upon, every body is com-Gined to deceive you, and the mysteries that have to long made you miferable, are all created by Miss Gunning's artful conduct; indeed, indeed, my dear Mrs. Gunning, though you think the is to marry L-d - do not set your heart upon it; the never will marry him.-How do you know this, faid I; because, replyed she, Miss Conning will marry L-d L-and not I d B From what authority de you declare it, Mrs. Bowen? because, reearthed the, about five days ago the wrote me a letter, in which the tells me what I now tell you, and in this letter there was inclosed one from the D- of --- to her father. which the defired I would get Mr. Bowen to copy for ber; and the defires me not to mention the report, which I must certainly have heard, as it was known over the whole town, that she was to be married to L-d

This letter, Mrs. Bowen, was not of my daughter's writing; some body has written to you in ber name; the contents are a direct contradiction of ber sentiments.—She insisted that it was of Miss Gunning's writing and sending, which she confirmed by an affeveration not common from the lips of a semale.—I did not exactly say that she had tworn to a false-bood, but still held to my affertion, that my daughter bad no band in the letter she had received.

Finding that by all her protestations she could not inforce my belief, or gain her own ends, whatever they were, by means of the letters, the faid, that at all events, though, the must give up Mils Gunning intirely, the was determined to open my eyes to her duplicity and wickedness. The reply I made to her was exactly in these words: And why thould you hefitate, Mrs. Bowen, to give ber up, for if the is fo guilty a creature, furely ber friendship is not worth preferring furely fe who can forfeit all claims to benear and delicacy, who can throw off the duty and affection the owes a mother, who has adored ber, cannot be expelled to perform any good action, or to be capable of one friendly office. E 2 This

This my answer to her ill collected and worse connected allegations, seemed, greatly to please her; she agreed intirely with my opinion, and assured me she would in survey despise Miss Gunning's friendship, and give up every thing to me without reserve.—

This was just the point I wanted to bring her to; for whoever had laid the borrible plan, I wished at one view to overlook the extent of it, but that I have since sound to be beyond the powers of mortal sight or mortal penetration.

Now, my dear Mrs. Gunning, continued this buman monster, to strengthen what I have told you about the two letters Miss Gunning sent to me; one of which she desired me to get Mr. Bowen to copy; I will tell you what she bas said to me this very day, and then you cannot doubt the truth of all that I have been saying.— Go on, said I, and conceal nothing, it is for my security that I should know all, that I may be able to defend myself against my enemies; there was no ambiguity whatever in this reply, it came from my heart; but she did not take it in the real sense, but in the sense I wished she might take it.—Again the incendiary poured out the warmest professions of Love, reverence, and compassion, for ber dearest Mrs. Gunning, for her more than mother, as she was pleased to call me, and again she kissed my hand.— I did not immediately withdraw it, but felt as if it had been fastened on by a serpent.

What a wretch, what a compleat wretch, is this vile daughter of your's, faid the; to have been fo long carrying on fuch a fcene of deception as has almost destroyed you; and fo I have told her this very day. - When and where Mrs. Bowen did you tell her so? First, at the Piano Forte, returned she; and afterwards on the stairs as we came up to you from the dining room. I first said to her, for shame ! for shame ! Mis Gunning; bow can you impose so on your mother, how can you appear to ber to carry on the affair with Lord B- and yet resolve to marry Lord I What was her reply, I asked. - Why, returned the, that I knew the was determined to marry Lord Land nothing should turn her, but that she was afraid to tell her Mamma-, and what did you fay to her again on the flairs, Mrs. Bowen? I faid, Miss Gunning, you are killing your dear good mother by inches, and if you do not tell her the abominable part you are acting, Mr. Bowen and I are come to a resolution, for the fake of your mother, to tell her of it ourfelves, for if we keep your fecret the will lose her life. - This, faid I, was very home indeed; could she say nothing in defence of herself? O las! no, replyed she, in a quick and pert voice, nothing in the world but poh! poh! never mind that,-Has any other conversation passed between you and ber to day Mrs. Bowen, faid I, on the fame subject? if there has tell me; you fee I am possessed of great strength of mind, and I appeal to yourfelf if you ever faw me more composed; though to be fure I have been very much furprized, and even spocked as much as it is the power of wickedness to shock me! she did not see herself restected on, but my dear, my innocent lamb, in the word wickedness; and thinking she had gained a complete victory over my credulity, the flattered my understanding, even at its own expence, for I must have been a fool indeed if I had given credit to what the pretended had passed between them at the Piano Forte. because I was fitting close by them the whole time, and not a word or a whifper could have escaped my ear and for that part of the readypassed upon the stairs, it is enough for me to say that my sister came out of the dining room, and up stairs with them, and not a syllable was uttered on that or any other subject.

To my question of what further might have passed between them on that day, Mrs. Bowen made the following answer. I forgot, my dear Mrs. Gunning, to tell you of it before, that when Miss Minifie went up to afk you how you did after dinner, and before the returned again to us. General Gunning, Mifs Gunning and myfelf, being left by ourselves, the General said fomething that must convince you that your daughter is acting the very part I have told you. - I begged to know what that fomething was .- Why, replied the, as foon as Milk Minifie was gone out of the room, General Gunning began to fay what a very handfome letter that was he had received from _____ notwithstanding it contained this reflection, that bis G-wished the General and his daughter had known their own minds fooner, for as his fon L-d B was indisposed, and had a very ftrong strong affection for Miss Gunning, he was afraid the disappointment would affect him very ferionly. When I repeated this part of Mrs. Bowen's curious collection of reports to my daughter on her return that evening from the duches of B——'s, it was arranged on the same catalogue of falseboods that had gone before it, for not a word had passed in the short absence of my lister from the table about the D—— of ———, L—d B—— or any letter whatever,

When Mrs. Bowen mentioned the D—s letter, and General Gunning's remarks on it, which she had before concerted or fabricated at the moment; it is impossible, said I, being a little off my guard, that Mr. Gunning could have said this of the D—of —'s letter, the duke of Argyll has shewn it to my daughter, and she has not mentioned to me any thing like what you inform me of now; on the contrary, his G——'s letter is perfectly polite and satisfactory.

you of it before, that when Muse Minile

Oh my dear Mrs. Gunning! The exclaimed, indeed you are deceived, you are cheated by them all, the Duke of Argyll, Miss Gunning, the is to marry Lord L it is contrived amongst them, and every body is helping on the match.

er sowed and barberdered barra Bowee in

Her violence recovered me from the falle ftep I had made, it forced me to collect myfelf; and as to get at the possession of the letters she had pretended to have received from my daughter five days before, was what I aimed at, I again threw out the tub to the whale, by pretending to swallow all her absurdities. - I am apt to believe the honourable party who employed her, as an alling partner in their dark work, did not give her a commission to go quite such lengths as the in her wisdom had thought fit to go; if they did, I shall advise them when they next undertake to deftroy happiness of a wife and a daughter, whether of their own or any other family, that they look out for an agent, who is to take so capital a share in the business of rather a better understanding than Mrs. Bowen's, least their own should be called in question; but in the present case to take away any imputation of the kind, I will allow, that before the was taken in to affift the other other conductors, nothing of svil was ever managed with greater address than this plan of defirution; I mean from its very first arrangement. I do not boaft of particular penetration in having detected Mrs. Bowen in her onfet of treachery, because a child of twelve years old might have feen through her as clearly as I did; but having discovered her treachery, I gave myself some credit for the more than Job's patience with which I dived to the bottom of it, and had she not been greatly supported, the very means she used would have defeated the ends for which the used them; but so supported, I have bitberto but in part been able to parry their blows of mischief .- I shall not interrupt my recital, or trouble your Grace with another observation of my own, until I come to the conclusion of Mrs. Bowen's intelligences. Every circumstance of which she thought it proper to confirm by pledging a foul, the value which by this time I should imagine your Grace must fully comprehend.

On the subject of the contrivances which she averred were carrying on by your Grace, my daughter, and others, to complete her marriage with L—d L—and to break off the treaty with -, Mrs. Bowen was partiwith L-d Bcularly elaboate, and particularly frong in her affeverations of its truth, and when I replyed, Mrs. Bowen whatever you may think of my daughter, however culpable fhe may appear to you, suppose her divested of all delicacy or bonour, yet I cannot but hope that in the Duke of Argyll I have not been miftaken; you must have been mifinformed at least in what concerns him, and I must still think myfelf and my daughter bonoured in his friendthip, and fafe under his protection.—This was her answer: -- upon my S- it is true that be is the worft of all your enemies, and except Miss Gunning's own wickedness, nothing can exceed the Duke of Argyll's: I could here scarcely forbear giving her one of those smiles that wears the livery of incredulity and conrempt, but geting the better of my inclination, because I had not yet got the letters from ber, I put on rather a look of conviction than one of unbelief, and turning to the table on which my writing materials always flood, and, as if perfettly convinced of my daughter's miscondull, I wrote such a letter to her, as I most certainly should have written without any finesse whatever, had the really deviated from the paths of delicacy and wath; in that cafe fhe the should have found no other support from me than what compassion, and compassion merely, has a claim to; but convinced that of all amiable beings she is the most amiable, my last breath shall go out in her vindication, and my last embrace shall be bers.

After I had written my foemingly severe letter, in which I had taken my leave of her for ever, I read it to Mrs. Bowen, who not only approved of it, but honoured, or rather dishonoured, the contents, with fuels repeated, and warm encomiums, that had I not found her out before, her mind on this occasion would have appeared to me in all the colouring of deformity and malice.

If the ever bas courage to look at ber own true picture in this my faithful representation to your Grace, though the may perhaps unblufbingly pass over the wickedness of her conduct, yet for her folly the certainly must feel, for none, except a simpleton, but must have discovered their own detection.—She saw me writing and afterwards I read to ber the letter, which was to throw off the darling of my beart, to take an eternal farewel of that child, on whom my life has bung from the hour of her birth, birth, and all this without a tear of difagpointment, or a figh of anguist; I am not at all confcious that I did not go through the whole talk with exactly the fame indifference. as I should have written a ballad or read a paragraph in the news papers concerning the national debt. It answered the ends I boped it would; foe thought me fecurely fixed in her Trap, and fo far from refuling me the letters when I asked her to let me fee them, she feemed concerned that she had not got them about her, offering to fend home for them or to go and fetch them herfelf, with as little apprehension as if I had been one of her own destructive agents. I refused to give her this trouble, and told her as it was fo late, tomorrow would do as well, in the mean time I would have ber go home, as what must pass between my daughter and me, when the came back from the Duchels of B. thought could afford ber no pleasure.

I faw the was rejoiced at my dismissing her, for how can the assaulter of innocence meet its ferene unsuspecting looks, whilst the dagger is yet in the assassin's hand, ready for further mischief.

But before the could lay hold of my permission, the knocking at the door announced the return of my darling; never have I feen any thing like her fright and her confusion. the wanted to hide herfelf in the next drawing-room to that in which we were fitting. but I told her she had better pass her on the stairs, and borro wher chair to take her home; the took my advice, and flew down, leaving the door open as the went out, by which means I heard my beloved fay to her upon the stairs, where are you going in such a hurry Mrs. Bowen? home, faid the vile woman; will you be so good as to lend me your chair? -to be fure, replyed the; but why not flay to supper?-By this time the other was in the hall and called out-go up to your mother, the wants you.

Having got rid of my mischievous visitor, and released your Grace from a very tedious, but a very necessary relation, I shall not trouble you with the conversation that ensued in our little circle, composed only of a daughter, a mother, and an aunt, whose hearts were more closely cemented by a tryed and well founded confidence in each other's restitude, than by the natural ties that have united them.

The

The result of our consultation on Mrs. Bowen's extraordinary embaffy from the lower regions was this-I dispatched a short note to her couched in terms through which she could not fee how well I knew her, and bow much I despised her; I am forry I did not keep a copy but it was the thought of one moment, and another carryed it from the House. - The purport of it was, that I had the pleasure to assure her that my daughter was an angel, that the letters she had received were certainly fent with no good intent by some secret enemy, and I could not but bope every thing else had proceeded from the same fource to injure my daughter, and to impose on ber and Mr. Bowen; that I was fure they must rejoice that I was quite satisfied myself, and should undeceive them the next morning. when I would call upon them and talk over the affair.

After this letter was sent away, the servant being told he was not to wait for an answer, we again and again tryed to account for the part Mrs. Bowen was acting, and we had but one opinion amongst us, that she was employed on the business by some body, and that whatever was the motive, it was taken in the part of the part of the business by some body.

up with too much violence to be easily re-

My daughter proposed going immediately to your Grace, from whom no thought of her pure heart had been concealed, to tell you what had happened, and to take your directions how we were to proceed, so as that we might detest the confederacy which we could have no doubt bad been formed, or was forming against her.—It was then so late, that with some difficulty I disfuaded her from going to your Grace that night; fhe was not for delaying it to the next morning, till I told her I fhould by that time have got into my possession the letters from Mrs. Bowen. and that it would be much better to lay them before you when the opened the conversation that had passed about ber, between that woman and myfelf.

My reasons at length conquered ber impatience to apply to your fatherly tenderness for advice that very night. Innocence was the tranquil companion of ber pillow, the Idea of Mrs. Bowen's treachery did not forsake me the whole night, and no shepherd, who sees the favourite lamb of his bosom in the wolf's wolf's graip, could have suffered what I did at the first approach of danger that threatened my darling.

In the morning General Gunning went out in the carriage, and left a meffage that he would fend it back by one o'clock, but to my most fevere disappointment he did not do what he faid he would, and without the coach we could not go to Mrs. Bowen's.

This memorable day, Sunday the fixth of February, Mr. and Mrs. Bowen have fixed to on barter their ETERNAL SALVATION, but to what end or for what reward, it is only the purchasers, and the purchased, that can ascertain; that they have sworn, and to the following exast effect, is no mystery; though the cause and the price of their oaths must remain enveloped.—They both sware, that on the sixth of February instant Miss Gunning came to their lodgings, and that shere wrote two letters, requesting that they might be shewn to me, and that these letters were inclosed and delivered to me when I called the same day on Mrs. Bowen.

Before I account to your Grace, which I mean to do, in the most unequivocal manner, for every hour of my daughter's time on this ever to be remembered day, the fixth of February, I shall request you, my Lord, to look back to the conversation of the preceding evening, the fifth of February; in which conversation this MISTRESS BOWEN tells me, confidentially, that she has received two letters, one of them from Miss Gunning, defiring the, Mrs. Bowen, would not mention to her mama the report that was so much about town, that she was to be married to L-d L and that the other letter Mr. Bowen was requested to copy. When these letters appear, as they shall do in their proper place, I beg your Grace will give yourfelf the trouble to compare that addressed to Mrs. Bowen from my daughter, with what Mrs. Bowen averred to my fifter and myfelf, to be the contents of that letter; though I have already taken some notice of this one little mistake, I must again point it out and repeat; this letter, Mrs. Bowen verbally declared, requested that she, Mistress Bowen, would not mention to mama the reports about town concerning the writer's marriage with L-d whereas the letter itself defires the reports reports may be hinted to mama, and by those very kind friends themselves.—Poor woman! I don't say it was not from inclination that she made this first error. I am myself a witness how indefatigable she was in performing the duties to which she was appointed; but there is this to be said in excuse for her negligence, when she fell into this little mistake, that though guilt may not destroy the memory it certainly confuses it,

I shall now, my Lord Duke, account to your Grace for every hour of Sunday the sixth of February, where and with whom, and in what manner it was really passed by my daughter; which the evidences of her attendants, during the whole of that day, will substantiate, and of course invalidate the perjured depositions of her father's relatives, and her father's friends the Bowens.

I have already observed that on the fixth of February, General Gunning went out in the carriage, leaving a message, that he should send it back by one o'clock, and that to our great disappointment it did not return at the time appointed.—From the hour of my daughter's geting up to breakfast, she did not F 2 leave leave the room a moment where ber aunt and I were fitting; and about half an hour after twelve (she said) perhaps papa will not fend home the coach fo foon as he promifed. I have a mind to walk to the Duchels of B--- when the carriage comes you may call for me there, we will then go to Mrs. Bowen's and get the letters, I will afterwards fet you down and go myself to Argyll-House. Her chairmen not being in the way as they were accustomed never to come for orders four in the afternoon, and the weather being good, I made no objection to her proposal, and attended by her own footman, John Dean, the fet out on foot for Pall-Mall, tot pay her duty to her most dear and revered patronels, from whose affectionate beart the endeavours of her enemies bave not been able to get ber dismissed, that kind patroness, that steady friend, to whom she is indebted for the most bonourable support in this time of her unmerited tryals; that tender protectres, whose endearing attentions have been, and still are, her solace and her comfort, that beloved benefactress whose bouse has received her, whose arms have sheltered her when driven both from the boule and arms of her most unfatherly father! - This is the only part part of my narrative on which I have fled a tear-it is the tribute of gratitude, of love, I had almost faid of adoration !- My darling stayed with the Duchess of Bas was every morning her cuftom to do, about an hour and a half; and then to prevent her being too much tired by walking home, her Grace had the goodness to send her back in her own chair.—The first question she asked, when she returned to us, was, if the coach was fent home; I told her, no. Upon which she said then I will take the Duchess of Be--'s chair, and go to Argyll-House, for I shall not be easy 'till I have seen the Duke, and told bim about Mrs. Bowen's bufiness with you last night .- Saying this the went out directly in the Duchess of B---'s chair, and was carried by her Grace's chairmen to Argyll-House, attended as before by John Dean.—She was not abient from St. Jame's-Place more than three quarters of an hour; I was furprifed at her coming back fo foon, and the told me the meffage your Grace had fent her by the porter, which was, that you could not see her then, but defired the would come to you in the evening.-After she returned from Argyll-House, she remained with her aunt and me 'till about three o'clock, when the Duchess of B-called for her; I saw her from the window go into the carriage with the Duchess, and saw them drive from the door. Before she went down stairs, she desired us to go to Mrs. Bowen's lodgings to get the letters from her, and afterwards to meet the Duchess and herself in Hyde-Park.

I must here observe a circumstance which otherwise may be passed over more slightly than it ought to be; the light will find its way through the smallest aperture, so will truth, though intangled in the labyrinths of deception.- Is it a very weak argument, my Lord Duke, of her perfett ignorance in regard to the writing or fending these letters that she should intend to go for them herself, and with us if the carriage had been returned in any fort of feafon? Does it feem likely that she should have proposed being present at my interview with these savages had she written two letters at their lodgings that morning, and commissioned them to deliver those letters to me? impossible! supposing I could not have accounted for every hour of her time on the fixth day of February which might have been the case, but which, God be praised, I can account for, even then, if it had so happened, I should have asked your Grace the fame question which I have now the honour of putting to you.-Was it probable this should have been the case after I had explained the whole of Mrs. Bowen's treachery on the preceding evening, of which nothing was concealed, because I chose my daughter should see her enemy as I bad feen ber, I had therefore drawn her in the same colouring as she appeared to me, like a venomous serpent, whose biffes were alarming, and in whose touch was destruction. -Knowing this, would she have gone to their lodgings the very next morning, have written letters there and confided the conveyance of them to Bowen and his wife, making them of consequence, and putting herself more than ever in their power? this would have been an act of folly, for which nothing but the most consummate state of idiotism could be accountable; but suppose her that idiot that the did go, that the did write, that the did confide in them, they must furely befides their other good offices have affifted her in framing those very letters, because the evening before, Mrs. Bowen had rebearfed the contents of them to me and very exactly, one fmall miftake excepted; which small mistake I have

I have before pointed out to your Grace. Indeed, my Lord Duke, thefe absurdities are too too glaring, and the falseboods too groß to be digested or even swallowed unless by a certain fet who from views of interest. jealousy, revenge, ENVY, or any other masculine or feminine passion of that description. have beroically united themselves in one. body to destroy a poor little girl, the innocence of whose beart, and the restitude of whose actions, are unfortunately a fatire upon their own .- I am only critically just, I glance only on those characters, where the edium of guilt must at last fall. I mean not to spend my bonest indignation in expressions merely, but to touch the adamantine hearts, if it be possible, of that certain combined boft, that has delighted to oppress me with every fort of affliction, the most difficult to be supported.

Again I return, my Lord, to the morning, or rather afternoon, of the 6th of February; for it was three o'clock when my daughter drove from the door with the Duchess of B, and in her Grace's chariot. They had been gone from St. James's-Place but a very few minutes when my own coach came back, after having attended my fifter and I loft no time in going to Mrs. Bowen's, and the fervant maid, who came to the door, gave into my hand a packet with her miftress's compliments, and was forry she could not be at home to receive me. I said it was very well, and ordered the servant to go on. I was not long in opening this curious packet the contents of which I shall lay before your Grace.

On the envelope, and without a date, I was thus addressed by Mrs. Bowen.

For your fatisfaction my D' Mrs.

my suspicions concerning my cousin.——
Being engaged to spend the day with Lady
Stanton she has called to take me out.

My comment on the above note or letter will be but a short one, that what she had fworn to as falls on Saturday night, or Sunday morning, were windled into suspicions.

Dear Mrs Bowen.

AS you feem to be in the confidence of Mama I think it right to tell you that you may hint to her that my affections are engaged to my C—n L—d L—— and that I am not to be married to L—d B—— as the feems to think; will you be fo good to get the enclosed copyed for me?

Affectionately yours,

(Signed) E. Gunning.

Observation on the above; the names of both parties are at length in the original, your Grace will know how to fill up the blanks I have left for them in the copy: There is this little commission in the spelling the first name only one small letter more than the name requires to be spelt with, which must have been particularly negligent in my daughter to have added, as she certainly has written the name too often for ignorance to have afforded ber any shelter.

Letter

Letter the second, enclosed in letter the first, to be copied by Mrs. Bowen, written on a half sheet of paper, without date or direction.

SIR,

I must say I wish you and your daughter had known your own minds sooner in respect to my son.

I am your most Obedient

Signed at length but the name mif-fpelt.

When to the score of premeditated coldhearted determined villainy is added the vast sums of folly, beyond all calculation, that have been expended to support that unfathomable villainy, how will the perpetrators of it shrink into themselves when they see not only their bearts but their beads laid open to public inspection!

Having perused more than once those notable forgeries in our way to the Park, rejoicing to have got them into our possession, we soon came up with the Duchess of B——, and both our carriages stopped within a speake speaking distance. - Have you got the letters, Mamma? faid my ferene angel. - I have, my love, replied I, holding then up, and you have gained a victory; I thought then as I fooke; I was by much too fanguine, thevictory yet remains to be gained, but that providence, which has supported us in the most trying of our calamities, will, I have not a doubt, conduct us through them, with bonour and with fafety. There were many coaches in the drive, for which reason I would not give her the letters there, but we followed them out of the park, and her Grace's carriage stopped at the top of Arlington-street, when the alledged writer of the most incorrigible nonfense than ever iffued from the pen of an idiot, being impatient to fee her reputed performances, fent one of the Duchess's fervants for the letters, which having been delivered to her we parted; for to make vifits with her Grace, and we came home; where the Duchess of B- fat her down about five o'clock; and for the remainder of that day, being the fixth of February, we were no more feparated, nor 'till we took leave of each other for the night, at the door of our respective chambers .- I beg to refer your Grace for our further proceedings on the fixth of February to page the was with me in the carriage when I called at your Grace's door that evening. One thing I must observe, that on this night General Gunning did not sleep at home, but breakfasted with his family the next morning, a thing very unusual.

Monday, the feventh of February, I wrote a note to Mrs, Bowen, and because she might not dery that the had received it, I carried it myself. I did not enquire when I stopped at her door if the was at home, but gave it into her maid's hand, as also a pair of gloves and some music she had left on Saturday evening in St. James's-Place; the fervant, without my being at the trouble of alking any question, gold me her mafter and mistress were at dinner; they might have spared this meffage, I should not have broke in upon their domestic felicity; how fearful is guilt! it starts at its own shadow! yet, if innocence was only to be expressed by the contrary extreme of confidence, furely fince that morning Mr. and Mrs. Bowen must have washed all their black deeds white. having, with even more than their own affurance, many days after I removed from Pall-Mall to my present lodgings in St. James'sftreet.

street, not only offered but even exerted themselves to force upon us the bonour of a visit from them; the consequences of which I shall represent to your Grace before I conclude my letter.—— I shall here insert the copy of that note, which I lest with Mrs. Bowen's servant.

Directed to Mrs. Bowen.

Mrs. and Miss Gunning present their compliments to Mrs. Bowen, and as they can never have an opportunity of thanking her in person for putting into their possession the two black forged letters, one supposed to be written by the --- of --- to General Gunning, the other as falfely ascribed to Mis Gunning addressed to Mrs. Bowen, they take this method to fay how very sensible they are of the good offices intended them. Mrs. Gunning begs Mrs. Bowen to recollect what she told her on Saturday night, and the folemn affeverations by which Mrs. Bowen attested the truth of her intelligence, having done this, the would then recommend to Mrs. Bowen's serious perusal the plalms for this day, as their language cannot be misinterpreted. Mrs. Mrs. Gunning defires her Opera Airs may be returned.

St. James's-Place, Feb. 7th, 1791.

As I am now going to drop the curtain, that will for a certain time exclude from your Grace's view, and also from the scene of action, two performers, who bowever disposed for the utive and bufy characters, appointed to them by the manager or managers, must now have convinced the audience by their blundering and differtions, how unfit they were to fustain their part with credit to the managers or themselves; and before I again expose them on my little stage, I shall address one ferious question to your Grace, beseeching you to give it a close examination. - I apply it to you, my Lord Duke, first, as a man of strong judgement and of cool reasoning- secondly, as a military officer, whose character is an bonour to the profession; and thirdly, I ask your decifion of it as a father.

To make myself clearly understood I shall bring this question forward, cloathed in a fort of form that may enable it to discover its own meaning, and to receive its own sentence, without my further interference.

Here

Here is an officer of birth, of character, and of rank in the army, whose conduct in America has marked him as by no means deficient in valour, who has been married nearly twentythree years, twenty-two of which his wife to this bour looks back upon with regret, as having drawn off all her happiness, and left her nothing but the bitter dregs of forrow and affliction.—This General officer is possessed of one only child, who to an understanding that would not difgrace more advanced age, than that the is yet arrived to, unites a beart, in which has constantly relided every feminine virtue, that gives to her fex the appellation of pleafing or amiable; where the fpirit of coquetry, or the design of ensnaring, have never entered, where nature has alone governed, and from which every fpecies of art has been excluded .-Here is also an officer, but a reduced one, a Captain upon half-pay, who has connected himself by a clandestine marriage with the General's family; both the officer and his wife are received by the mother of this amiable and only child, not with civility merely, but are diftinguished by every mark of regard and kindness that it is in ber power to bestow upon them; appearances are in their favour, and their hearts feem to have no expression more more frong than that of gratitude. - This offiver looks up for interest and expects it to come from his coufin, the General, who has a regiment: he visits at the General's house. dines and fups at the General's table, and pays that fort of attention which is called court, to ingratiate himself with bis patron in Embrio. - Suddenly, and without having received offence of any kind whatever from the destined victim, from ber mother, or any part of her family, he fleals upon them unsuspectedly, and under the mask of friendship buries the concealed dagger in the very beart of innocence, marking it with a thousand gashes, to deface, if that were possible, the brightness of its vilage; he forgets in the moment of affaffination, that innocence is immortal :- The father of this only darling child is a man of valour, but the affaffin fears him not .- This only darling shild is falfely difgraced, and her father himself pronounces with his own lips the fensence of her hanishment from bis bouse and from his protestion. The bands of relationship are by these very means drawn tighter, and the union more closely cemented, between the General, who bas a Regiment, and the reduced Captain who wants a Company. - The father calls the Captain his bonourable friend, who has

has found out and discovered to him a flaw in his daughter's reputation, and holds him up as another Scipio; himself a Roman father; he mistakes the character, Virginius did not fasten disgrace on the same of his daugher; she too was an only child; he stabbed her to prevent her being disgraced: This Paragon of justice hugs his bonourable cousin, whilst the Captain, to shew his bumble gratitude, associates with his patron's own groom, a stable keeper, two hostlers, a french footman, and an Irish chamber-maid, to pursue with easy assistants that innocence which he had before vainly endeavoured to destroy.

Thus, my Lord Duke, stands before your Grace my question in its true and unquestion-able shape, make the application, and let your own heart announce judgement.

Tuesday the 8th of February, when we came down to breakfast, we found lying on the table the following anonymous letter thus directed.

Mifs MINIFIE,

General Gunning's St. James Place.

These are the contents, but without a date.

MADAM,

The respect I feel for the character of Mrs. G——— as well as yourself makes me very sincerely feel for both. Why two persons so nearly concerned should be last undeceived appears to me extraordinary—Give yourselves but the trouble to enquire and all mysteries will cease—Apply personally to the Duchess of B—— you certainly may rely on her.

A Sincere Friend.

P, S, Don't be apprehensive of any duels none is likely to take place,

Observe, if you please, my Lord, the remarks that I am about to make on the above letter of our very Sincere Friend.—

St. James Place on the direction is exactly the same as it is spelt on the direction of that letter delivered by General Gunning's groom, and supposed to come from the D—of—and which gave me the first suspicion of its having been opened, re-directed, and re-G3 sealed, fealed, by fomebody, with fome evil defign: - It is likewise spelt in the same way with the threatning letter my daughter received many months ago, and as the day after my fifter got this anonymous letter, General Gunning bimfelf told her Captain Bowen was the writer of it; and as it was not in his own but a disguised hand, I cannot but think it argues much in favour of his being mafter of many hands, and that he may have had no small there in all the other forged letters :- what can Captain Bowen, or whoever elfe is the fabricator of the letter, which is now the fubject of my observations, possibly mean by defiring us to apply personally to the Duchess of B and by saying that all mysteries would then cease? it rather seems to increase than diminish the number of them; the Duchess of B------ could not understand the machinations of Captain Bowen and his affociates, there is no fimilarity whatever in the language of ber heart and their hearts.

I perfectly understand his bint about the duel, and so will you my Lord; there is no occasion for its being publickly explained. I should bope what I have already said, and what I have still to say, may suffice to convince vince your Grace how much you have been misted, and how severely, how very severely we have been the sufferers. I should be extremely forry to be forced upon still plainer language and plainer truths; but she who can give up a once beloved busband to save her child from a fate more dreadful than a martyrdom of torture, to fnatch her fame, pure and unfullied from the hands of fratagem and cruelty, fuch a mother cannot be expected to stop short of her designs, because other sacrifices of much less consequence are necessary to be made to the just and good work she has undertaken, and which she is determined to purfue. I have never had but this one occasion on which I could exert myself as I have now done. I will not misname the sentiment that actuates me, it is not stubbornness, it is not felf-will, it deserves the appellations of resolution and of firmness; on the contrary, with what fatisfaction, with what Joy, shall I lay down the arms necessity has forced me to take up, in the cause of defenceless, most wronged, and most oppressed innocence.-Revenge is not the infligator of my purpole; I do not even defire that the punishment ber affassins have so well earned should fall upon them, but that spotless honour, so cruelly mangled, G 4 mangled, so inhumanly butchered, shall be bealed, and that character, so meanly pilfered from her, shall be restored, even at the price of names and circumstances I now wish to con-Indeed, my Lord, I cannot, I do not for a moment, suffer myself to class you in the catalogue of her wicked pursuers; help me therefore to detect them; leave their punishment to the Almighty, but force them to restore what they have taken from us; we ask but for our own; that alone will make us sufficiently rich .- There is a glorious poverty and there is a poverty ignoble.—The loss of fortune in such a cause as this is glorious. But to remain the sport of malice, the food of scandal, to set tamely down and submit to appear poor and deficient in fuch treasures as belong to the foul, in which we know our own riches, would be worfe than the mifer, who permits himself to starve in the midst of plenty. It would be more, it would be contemptible, it would be the very essence of the poorest poverty.---

I feel my subject, it impresses me to pronounce upon it with energy unequivocal.— I am near that period of my letter, which will open to your Grace a scene of distresses and of cruelties, eruelties, such as Nero himself, that great master in the art of termenting, would not think a disgrace to his talents, had be been their reputed instigator.

Why have the combined plotters, for none but the tools of mischief would have so meanly employed themselves, amongst their other ridiculous infertions in the news-papers accused me of Novel writing; particularly of a book called Waltham-Abbey; which is made up they fay of tricks, of stratagem, and of forged letters. I must affure them their mistake is a very palpable one, for though to have been the author of that book might possibly have done honour to my genius; yet, as I never have feen fuch a book, or ever before heard their was such a book written, I cannot without great injustice, and greater prefumption, lay any claim to the credit of being its writer,

I shall not dismiss, since I have entered upon it, the subject of news-papers, without informing your Grace that I have experienced from the conductors of several daily prints the most liberal, and the most gentlemanly behaviour.—They have not only waited upon

I told them, and it was from the very truth of my beart that I spoke it, their interest in the sale of the paper being concerned, I must at the same time, that I thanked them for their politeness, reject their well-intended proposal; that even could I have accepted it without injuring injuring them, I had another reason that would have prevented me from accepting it that nothing had ever been inferted through the whole affair by myfelf, by any part of my family, or by any person or means whatever known to us, or at least that we knew, If, my Lord, you are convinced, if my injured innocent lamb is reconciled to your good opinion and your affections, fhe will be now dearer to your heart than ever, in proportion as the has suffered from the false impressions you have fo fatally imbibed; conviction must follow the truths I have laid before you, and then you will not only understand what have been my feelings at every instance of friendship or bumanity shewn to me on this occasion, but your Grace will also partake of them with me. mail most freed

My foul is sensible of an almost unconquerable repugnance to enter on the events of Wednesday the 9th day of February, marked down on the calander of time as more fatal to domestick happiness, and more destructive of natural affection, than any era that has gone before it. I even tremble with horror when I restect on the irresistible power that now bids me retrace them on paper; although from from my mind, whilft I have life and recollettion, they never never will be erased .-I have but few circumstances to add to the preceding Tuesday the 8th of February, on that day your Grace faw this darling facrifice. When in the morning she was taken to Argyll-House by her -...... I should die in this part of my narrative to call him her F-; all was then, at least in appearance, as it used to be; she did not see you but in the presence of General Gunning; but you received her with your accustomed tenderness. Surely, my Lord Duke, you would not have so ill bestowed those tokens of your goodness, had your mind then been tainted with the poison of suspicion; but (at what unbappy moment it afterwards took effect, or by what witchcraft I know not, it is too much for me to know,) from that moment I date a fuccession of miseries, perhaps more acute than even the male and female artificers who worked them into this form could, in the most sanguine of their hopes, have supposed or expetted! On the evening of the same day my daughter went to Pall-Mall, and her dear maternal friend, the Duchess of Bthinking her cough much increased, was very uneasy, and fent her home early; when full full of the tenderest anxiety for the prefervation of her health, her Grace fent a note to her own physician to request he would lofe no time in going to St. James's-Place, and prescribing for her, and Doctor H-, had the goodness to come to us foon after. Any elogium from me on this gentleman's skill or humanity would be arrogating to myfelf a knowledge, which must be univerfally understood wherever he visits; I have great obligations both to him and to Mr. Y- for their attention to my daughter, during the fevere indisposition that was the companion of her other misfortune; and, if your Grace should still be interested in her prefervation, you will not think me impercinent that I trouble you on the subject of my acknowledgements to them, double belief to be symple in the board as

I am at last arrived to that part of my letter, which like death has ever been in my view, and like death, though protracted, will not be put off.—I compare myself in my present undertaking to some miserable creature whose house is in slames, and who has no way to escape but by the dangerous expedient of throwing himself off from the very top of it; neither have I any way of restoring restoring my daughter's reputation unblemished to your Grace and to the world, before whom she has been publickly disgraced, but by giving up the cruel authors and contrivers of her disgrace; one of which, if it had been possible, I would have screened, but that one has put it out of my power by his own hardiness and inflexibility; I have no path to chuse between the two misfortunes; I therefore shall keep in that of truth, which, though difficult, is straight, and through which God and my conscience will conduct me.

Terrifick is the picture I am forced to exhibit, it must be a mere body indeed who can look upon it unmoved; the defigners and executers of it excepted; a foul will be discovered in every spectator, and not a wound shall I inflict by sympathy or compassion, but will sharpen every pang of my felfish sorrow. I might, my Lord Duke, in fome fmall degree have spared your heart and my own by holding up this picture of borrors in a light as little conspicuous as truth would have permitted me to do, but understanding that General Gunning has thought it proper to deny his having turned my darling from his house, and on the contrary avows on every every occasion that she left it voluntarity. I am compelled to bring it forward to the light, such as it really is, without concealment and without exaggeration; this new affertion impoles on me additional daties, it fastens on me the necessity of expunging it, for if suffered to remain, though every thing else were done away, she would not be that faultless daughter, and that perfett being which I know ber to be, and for which I pledge my expectations of all comforts in this world, and all my bopes of bappiness in the next.

As I mean not to apply to report, or to any third petion by hear-fay, for the explanation of fasts, which are to be clearly substantiated, and as General Gunning did not deliver his accusations, or his mandate, for her departure from his house, either to my daughter or to myself personally, but to my sister, to her therefore I now resign my pen, that she may give the exast words that passed between General Gunning and herself on that occasion.

My LORD DUKE,

I have the honour to lay before your Grace at the request of my sister Gunning, the following particulars of the conversation that passed between General Gunning and myself, on the 9th of February, respecting my niece Miss Gunning, and which I shall be ready to affirm at any time, or in any manner, your Grace shall think proper to require from me such confirmation.

I have the honour to be, Your Grace's obedient fervant,

Wednesday, Feb. 9. General Gunning called me into his dressing-room, I was at the time going to him, to tell him that Miss Gunning had been ill the evening before, and that Dr. Harmon had been with her at the Duchess of B——'s request, which before he spoke to me I informed him of, but how was I shocked to hear him say, that he was not in the least surprized at it as she had such a load of guilt on her mind; that she had forged a letter from the D—— of ———, and also those supposed to have been been written by L-d B-, that the prevented his, General Gunning's, groom from going to B-m, and had given him the letters which he was to fay he had brought from the D-of - I asked him how it was possible for her to get the seals of the D- of - and of L-d B-: his answer was, she had seals of all kinds, and that the had been at Captain Bowen's lodgings, on Sunday morning the 6th, before they gave up the two letters to Mrs. Gunning. I told him those letters were not written in Miss Gunning's hand: his reply was, fhe could write all forts of hands. I then told him that I had an anonymous letter yesterday morning. He said he knew that I had had one, and that it came from Captain Bowen; which letter, my Lord, Mrs. Gunning has inferted. He faid, if I would take her keys I thould find in her box the copies of those very letters; that he did not like to fpeak to Mrs. Gunning upon the fubject, as they were on bad terms. I did go up as he defired me: shocked to be fure the was at the fallehoods her father had alledged against her, but conscious innocence did not fuffer her to be discomposed. She gave me her keys, and I opened her box, in which H which there was no paper or letters, but fuch as came from your Grace's family. I' went again to General Gunning, and told him there were no fuch copies as he mentioned: then, faid he, she must have burnt them. I told him the was as innocent as an angel, and that the was determined to. vindicate herself: his reply was, that she would then be ruined for ever, for that if the did the D- of --- would profecute her, and lay her in prison for life; that the only thing she had to do was, to go into the country, or leave England. I replyed, the would do neither, that the was determined to clear her innocence: he faid that was impossible, and bid me to watch her, for otherwise as soon as the felt the weight of her guilt she would destroy herself. I had not patience to hear more, and left the room.

About an hour afterwards, the General went out in the coach, and in another hour he stopped again at the door in his carriage, and fent up for me: he then beckoned the to come into the coach, which I did: tell house, for if the attempts it, the will not be let in. He again told me the must go into the country or leave England; and I again repeated, the would do neither, but would stay and vindicate herself; then, said he, the must quit my house: I lest the carriage immediately; he called after me, and told me to tell her every thing he had said: I replyed I certainly would; and so ended all that I can recollect of the conversation.—There was nothing in General Gunning's appearance or in his words that spoke him grieved when he bid me to tell his daughter to leave his house.

The task, my Lord, again devolves on me, to pursue the detail of miserable Wednesday, and many succeeding days of black-complectioned forrows—I shall not now require the aid of any pen but my own, because I have been the witness of every scene extent.

cept that repeated by my fifter, and of which the only could give an exact relation.-The approaches of bonour are awful, her fleps are marked with firmness, and her countenance is stained with no reflection of shame when her enemies stand forth her accusers. Not like her unsbaken constancy is the effrontery of guilt: there is nothing awful in her affested parade: every unfteady step she takes betrays her character, however difguifed; and though the may fome times and for some purposes attempt to pass herself on others as the friend of boneur, yet, rather than meet her face to face, she will wrap herfelf up in her own confusion, and sculk behind her own treason.—This observation. my Lord, is not intended as the embellisher of Facts, but to convey them to your Grace with more decency of expression than I could do by giving the plain and undifquised reason why, on the day my beloved child was surned from her natural home, General Gunning fremuoufly avoided the fight of ber and of myself. My simile is tantamount to every thing that can be faid on that subject.

I was fitting by the bedfide of my dear injured innocent, and holding one of her hands between mine, when her aunt came up into the room with a face paler than ashes. and agitated beyond all description, though the evidently endeavoured to conceal it-What's the matter with you Auntee Peg? (a name which from infancy fhe has always called her by) what makes you put on fuch a long face? asked the angel. I faid nothing, but my heart was not the less alarmed-my love. replyed her aunt, I have had a very extraerdinary conversation with your father; and then with all the tenderness, and all the caution, that could be observed on such an occafion, she broke to us the false accusations, and the cruel, most cruel messages that accompanied them. Paule here! my Lord, and acknowledge the powers of innocence; for had a fingle particle of guilt been at this moment the inmate of ber bosom or my own, fuch a sentence of infamy and banishment, pronounced from the lips of a father and a busband, must have destroyed our faculties, if not ended our existence. The blow was sudden, and our perfect innocence made it H 2 the

the more unexpected, of course we were the less prepared for its reception; yet our faculties were not annibilated, nor were we crushed beneath its ruinous pressure.

Herefore, when fiction has guided my pen, my heart has been foftened by compassion, and my tears have flowed over diffresses of my own creating; but Nature has appointed me to a talk which I am totally incapable of performingas a mother I cannot hold ber pencil-the colours alone blind me, to lay them on is impoffible! one expression, though I die in the repetition of it, shall not be withheld, and may it touch with agonizing repentance the heart of bim to whom it was addressed-"O! papa! papa! is it you who fallely accuse me?"-and to her own beaven her eyes were directed, freaming with the bitter tears of anguish-A good God protected me at that moment a vow iffued from my beart which my judgement has fince confirmed; and this letter I am now writing will only serve to show with what steadfastness I am determined to persevere till the whole meaning of that vow is unequivocally and fully performed.

The

The letters mentioned by my fifter, which were found in the box of the dear injured innocent Martyr, belonging folely, my Lord Duke, to your Grace's family, and written to her on a certain subject, perhaps was you to fee them, you would have wifeed me to suppress. them-I have done it-had I experienced the Same candour from others, which has marked my conduct to them, how different would have been my fate: I should have then nothing to complain of. I fearn a mean action, or to tread in an intricate path, though it should lead me to a throne-Some of the mysteries that invelope me, I should be much obliged to your Grace if you would have the goodness to explain; it is only from yourself I hope for an explanation or expett it-Why were the affectionate letters supposed to be written by Land B to my daughter, and whice ane was afterwards honoured with the reputation of being the inventor and the writer of, why were they never permitted to be in her own possession, er even in her hand but once, and that for no longer time than she could give them a curfory reading? How happens it that the four dif-HA ferent ferent Expresses your Grace sent to L-d B fhould all be under the management of my daughter, who never faw the affectionate letter so flattering to herself, and supposed to be written by L-d B-, till your Grace shewed it to her at Argyll-House? Were they not, my Lord, all your own domefticks, and fent by your own commands to L-d B-? How comes it then that fhe has any share in changing or altering those letters? Surely ber treasures must be inexbauftible, that she should be able to command your Grace's servants, as well as those of General Gunning; and her capacity for intrigue and management must have been very much fuperior to any thing that has ever gone before her! Why, my Lord, are not the letters, and copies of letters, that in the fulleft confidence of my heart I had the hopour, at your own request, to convey to your hands; why are the letters to and from my daughter, even to the fmallest of her notes; why is a letter from L-d B- to a lady, whom neither your Grace's family or my own has the bonour to be connected with; why are they not all returned? General Gunning can have have no interest in any thing that concerns myfelf or my daughter. The 9th of February saw us separated for ever and for ever. It is most certain that I was not commanded to leave his house on that day, the General is too good a manager of his fortune, and has earned that fortune by too many facrifices, to have given me a claim, by the laws of my country, to any part of it. No, to do him justice, the act of leaving his house was entirely my own; and if by having done so I should lay myself under the censure of folly, I have only this to say in my defence, that I rather chose to follow an Angel than to remain with the very reverse of an Angel.

Nothing that I can fay of General Gunning's prudence and acconomy, in regard to money matters, which are now in a more flourishing state than at any time since I have had the bonbur of being numbered in his bousebold suite, can be set down to the scare of flattery; who will not suspect me of even exaggeration in this particular, and, most distinguished of all his merits, when I assure your Grace that, at the moment he divested himself himself of so beavy an incumbrance as the maintenance of a wife and a daughter, he loft nothing but their duty, their love, and their good opinion; on the score of money he was a gainer; for, with uncommon address, by borrowing, that same week, from the narrow purse of his generous unsuspetting daughter, the whole of her little flock, the first loan five guineas, the last a bank note value twenty pounds, he contrived to difmis them with one fingle folitary guinea between them both; my fifter was not quite fo ill provided, and, like the Children of Ifrael, in more respects than one, we had no separate interest, and the means of one became the means of all The next day, indeed, General Gunning was so very bumane as not only to fend me a fifty pound bank note, but also, a letter containing his most friendly advice, that we should go and fettle in Italy; had I candescended to have made any answer to this advice, it should have been only in thefe words-" THE WICKED FLEETH WHEN NO MAN PURSUETH, BUT THE RIGHTEOUS IS AS BOLD AS A LION."

Although I have suppressed ten thousand times more than I have expressed, yet I believe I have faid enough to make your Grace suppose, I should not think it an augmentation of my misfortunes to refign to the principal authour of them, if it was in my power, the honour of his name, and the title of his wife: the power of commencing fuch an astion, and the proofs to support it, I am possessed of; but I am not possessed of the least inclination or intention to take advantage of those proofs; and I will boneftly tell your Grace the reason, for my otherwise unaccountable lenity; truth has been declared a libel, and as it is not impossible but before my vow is fully accomplished I may be forced to enter on circumstances where I shall hold it necessary to speak very plain truths, then I may find it rather more convenient to be a married than a fingle woman; it is only to fcreen myfelf, and not to subject bim to damages that I have taken up this resolution; for it is his partners alone that will at any time be the objects of my animadverfions; and from the refentment of his partners and friends, however bigh, or however low, be can have nothing to fear; furely his partners partners and his friends will not come on him for my poor trespasses.

I am naturally, my Lord, of a cheerful difposition, and as those forrows that have overtaken my darling and myself are not the offsprings of our own conduct, they have only knocked at the door of our hearts and asked for lodgings there, but sinding every apartment occupied by innocence, and her sober family, they now, without intirely forsaking us, come with a less severe aspect, and have not pilfered any thing that belongs to us or to innocence.

However I may, to prevent my spirits from sinking below the standard requisite to support me in my present employment, ometimes venture to deliver my serious sentiments, under the light garb of raillery, or obscure them in simile, still they are not the less authentic for being thus disguised; a barmless disguise, it surely may be called; for stripped of those coverings, the sentiments themselves might have appeared in a more representing form to all who have been concerned cerned in creating them—my meaning is very much the same with that of a tooth drawer; there is something wrong in the bead of bis patient, there is certainly something also wrong in the beart of my patient; this wrong must be made right, and in the very essence of mercy we both try to conceal, as much as we can, the operatical instrument, whilst, with the best design in the world, we are putting them to the torture.

Loth, as I am, to turn back again to Wednesday, the 9th of February, its further claims to the notice of your Grace are not to be refifted; this protecting bufband, and this sheltering father, untouched by remorfe, impenetrable to the feelings of nature, having left his commands for removing from bis house the most valuable gem that a parent ever possessed, and the brightest ornament his bigb family have ever boafted-without a tear-without a figh-without even asking how she had fultained the weight of wee his invention had forged, and his favage cruelty forced upon her; be left her, and he left her for ever to faint, or to ftruggle under it, as chance thance might direct—Mistaken man! it was not chance that presided over the destiny of a being like this—she had not disgraced the work of ber maker—the immaculate pureness with which she came from his hands had never been sullied—she could with considence look up to him for protection, and he protected her.

With all her calmness of foul, and fortitude that I have never feen equalled, for many hours it was impossible to move her from the spot where the lightning Aruck her, and it was near feven o'clock in the evening before we could, with any degree of fafety to her precious life, drag her from St. James's-Place to Pall-Mall, where a house. of her dearest and almost only friend, was made ready for her reception-Before we changed our abode of mifery, for that hospitable retreat, General Gunning's groom afked to speak to me : I believe it was between four and five o'clock in the afternoon, and her physician was then with my faffering angel. I went into another room and fent for him up. I do not exaggerate when I tell your Grace

Grace that I was flartled when he opened the door and flood before me in the attitude of guilt personified in all his horrours. I looked full at him, as I should have done had an evil spirit, or Captain Bowen bimfelf, been the object of my forming. I asked what he wanted to fay to me, and repeated my question more than once before the wretch, though he did attempt to speak, could make me a coherent answer. Harryes were fixed on the carpets his face has not the veltige of life's blood in it; and I am fure he could not have fised had he not supported himself against the door: at last, without daring to lift up his eyes, he mumbled fomething about his having been with your Grace that morning; that now he had discovered all, and he hoped Master. Madam, and Mis, would do very well again. He faid fomething about his Mafter's having fent him, but what I did not understand at the time, of course cannot remember it now. This was too great a tryal for my patience; and I commanded the villain from my prefence.

Oh! my Lord, many, even many more than have ventured to shew themselves in the light, have been the enemies of my child and of me, in this most barbarous affaffination of our reputations, and of our peace; if the most inoffenfive lives could have fecured us an unmolested passage through this vale of at best negative happiness, we had a right to expect it, but there is a deadly reason that lurks at the bottom of this mischief; jealousy envy, and avarice have not been idle; fearch out this concealed, this deeply buried cause of our afflictions; do it, my Lord, as you expect peace at that moment to which we are all arriving; for an omission like this, angels, who had the charge of executing it, would be accountable.

My daughter was fo ill after she was removed to Pall-Mall, Wednesday, that though I was determined to leave her, as soon as I had seen her safely lodged, on very particular business in which she was herself concerned, yet I could not do it, till I saw her more composed and asseep, which was not till four in the morning, under the tender care of her affettionate aunt; I then prevailed on myself to quit her apartment, and in twentyfour bours I began and completed a journey of a hundred and forty miles, without taking off my clothes for two nights, or any refreshment whatever, but one glass of water and one of wine; I mention this circumstance, not because I have any pleasure in egotism; but as a tribute to Divine Providence, and that others of my defenceless sex may know where to repose their tonsidence when they are oppreffed with afflictions as was, I finking under bodily complaints as I was; and forfaken as I was; I speak from conviction, from experience, and whoever applies to the same fource for affiftance and protection that I have done, will never find themselves disappointed.

When I returned to Pall-Mall, Thursday the 10th, at half after four in the morning, I found my beart's darling much worse than when I left her: she had been bled, but seeing me come back well, and in safety, all her anxiety subsided, and she had a refreshing sleep of some hours—the day on which I was out of town, the day on which she was a dangerously dangerously ill, the very day following that ever to be stigmatised for deeds of complicated. wickedness and complicated distresses, the corroding withered fruits of that contrived wickedness, was the day that General Gunning, whom Providence had bonoured with the title of her father, but which name he had himself dishonoured beyond a possibility of ever reclaiming it, made choice of to dine and fup at the house of one of bis friends, where his daughter had been invited, but had not accepted the invitation; and, indeed, fince that time I understand dinners, suppers, private parties, and publick affemblies, have occupied all the hours of this extraordinary father, exceptthose that are dedicated to the further destruction of his most amiable, unoffending, and most innocent daughter.

Accusations of so preposterous a nature, composed of forgeries, bribery, falseboods, contrivances, and consummate vanity, were not taxes that virtue and bonour would submit to pay, though invented, laid on and supported by bim, whose authority, like Tippoe, Sultan's, had never before been disobeyed or disputed; diffuted; the refidence of honour and virtue was in the chafte bosom of my daughters they directed her where to appeal for justice; and for judgement; it was not to the courts of men, it was to that tribunal before which all men and all women too must account, not only for their actions but for the motives of them. and the bleffed Evangelifts were called upon by their indisputable evidence to attest her innocence. When the took the facred pledge in her fleady hand, and with angelick compolure of countenance and of voice, carryed it to lips uncontaminated by falfebood, triumphed in the adorable object of my heart. and at that moment I could have received but one additional gratification, which would have been to have had all ber enemies spectators of the scene before me. Of those atteltations there were four authenticated to the lame purpose and in the same words, one of them addressed thus-For my Father, his Grace the Duke of Argyll, Lord Frederick Campbell, General Conway, and Andrew Stuart, Efg.-was fent the same day, Monday the 14th of February, directed to your Grace at Argyll-House; another of them was conveyed to the Accusations alledged against me.

My answers on oath.

I. I am accused of having written letters in the name of the D— of M————, and of L—B————, and also of writing anonymous letters.

I. I never have written, or caused to be written, any letter, or note, in my whole life, in a disguised hand, by a fictitious name, or anonymous.

II. I am accused of going to Mrs. Bowen's lodgings, on Sunday the 6th of February, about the forged letters produced by her. II. I never was in Mrs.Bowen's lodgings in my life; I never met her by appointment, or by chance, at any third place; the only place in which I have ever feen her has been at my father's house, or in my father's carriage, and never without my mama or my aunt being present. I never wrote her a note or a letter in my life; I never spoke to her confidentially on any subject whatever.

III. I am accused of having bribed papa's groom, not to go to Blenheim with a letter from papa to the D-of Mand a narrative of my writing, which I had drawn out at the request of papa for the purpose (as he faid)

. III. I never spoke to papa's groom, or caused him to be fpoken to, prior to, or on the fubject of his journey to Blenheim I gave him no orders whatever, or any lecter whatever, or any bribe whatever: I believed he had been at of being fent to the Blenheim, and that D- and D- of the letter he brought M--; that I back was from the bribed the groom, D- of M---; not really to go to and I felt happy and Blenheim, but to fay grateful for the ho-I 2 nour he had been there nour his Grace had and to deliver, as done me. coming from the D—of M——, a letter that I had given him for that purpose,

The following preamble was affixed by my daughter, and written by herself, immediately after the accusations and her answers to them, and before the awful oath was administered to her:

As I may perhaps from my time of life be supposed not to understand the nature of the solemn oath I am about to take to attest my innocence of the above charges, I beg to assure the magistrate who shall administer the oath to me and the witnesses present, that I know, on the truth of what I affert depends my character in this world and my everlasting salvation in the world to come.

The oath being administered by William Hyde, Esq. one of his Majesty's Justices of the peace, and witnessed by two gentlemen men of probity, was figned by herfelf, E. Gunning.

Your Grace may perhaps think these particulars are an unnecessary tax on your patience; if I have committed an error have the goodness to pardon it merely on these considerations; that I am reduced to the humiliating necessity of removing the artificial stains malice and columny have thrown, allow me to add, I most vulgarly heaped on the character of a young unprotected creature. whose beart and actions will appear more critically correct the more and the nearer they are examined into; that I am now doubly ber parent, for though her father liver he is no longer ber father; that I am a woman cut off from every possible resource of consulting wife and subtle heads, how I am to have my injuries redreffed; and last of all, I confess myfelf, though fuch a confession may be added to the score of my faults, an offended, I will use a still stronger expression and fay I am an exasperated mother.

Sunday night, the 12th of February, at half an hour after twelve, and just fourteen 14 hours hours preceding the angel's attestation, which fo fully evinces the nature of her acquaintance with Mrs. Bowen, that plotting gentlesvoman, not fatisfied with the part she had so kindly undertaken, and so speedily dispatched, of assisting to make a married man into a backelor, and a father childless, by helping him to clear his house of all matrimonial incumberances, without confidering how necessary it was that we should be allowed a little breathing time in Pall-Mall, before the again molested us with her olios of nonfense and mischief, she honoured the dear sufferer at the above house with the following ingenious compofition, delivered at my door by a chairman, who faid he brought it from the neighbourhood of May-fair, I shall give your Grace the copy of this letter as it lies before me, marked as the has marked it.

End of Mrs. Bowen's letter.

Undeferving, my Lord, as the above letter is of your notice on the score of its own intrinsick merit, and contemptible as I hold the writer of it, yet it may be made the ground work of a few observations, that, in a small degree, may elucidate the subject on which I have now the honour of addressing your Grace.

On the envelope of the letters, delivered by her fervant to me when I called at her lodgings, Sunday the 6th of February, if your Grace will give yourfelf the trouble to look back on that envelope, I think you will find thefe words:-" I enclose you what as gave room to my fuspicions regarding " my cousin." Suspicions is rather a vague expression for fasts, which but the evening before were announced with certainty, and confirmed by oaths; and feem to be equally a contradiction to this her fecond letter addreffed to my daughter; as by the importance of her style, and the immensity of her advice, one cannot but suppose the poor culprit was entirely in her power-With what feverity she condemns, and with how much lenity she acquits in the fame inftant, is amazingly curious; the has diffraced herfelf, the has made her parents unbappy, yet Mrs. Bowen is convinced the has a good heart .- She has duped her mother and her aunt, deceived Mr. and Mrs. Bowen, and is left by that pious lady to the fings of her own conscience; good woman! she is too charitable to upbraid her:-No, the is her dear coufin, and Mrs. Bowen the fincerest of her friends .-She invites her-will receive her with the fincereft love and affettion, yet dares to treat ber as a criminal! the least of whose fmiles I have have seen her play the buffoon and act the speophant in the bope of attracting.—She sbreatens her with the steps her father means to take against her, and gives for the reason that his own character is now at stake.—This is by no means the case, for it bas suffered execution. She invites her to the protection of this father.—She bids her read her letter twice, and with attention—We have done more, we have read it a score of times, and to attention always have added admiration.

She defires her to consult her reason and her judgement; this is a trifling error, because if she had not the honour of reposing her considence in Mrs. Bowen, the advice is presuming and impertinent; and if she had chosen Mrs. Bowen for her considente in an affair where cleverness was certainly an indispensible requisite, the choice itself of such a considential friend, would have explained that she had neither reason or judgement to which she could apply for council.

Having attempted the diffection of this body of treason, and perhaps like some of the profession shewn more skill than tender-ness mess in performing the operation, I shall for the present turn away from the subject itself, and take it up again at my own convenient leisure. I make no apology to you, my Lord, for my severity, but, if you think one at all necessary, your Grace will have no difficulty to find it in the next article.

Tuesday the 15th of February two questions stated on paper, and written by the hand of a father with all the coldness of a floick, and all the crooked turnings and windings of the law were, prefented to his daughter, and that daughter his only, his meritorious child; to tell her that be bad feen her atteffation, and to ask if she would confels that she was at Mrs. Bowen's lodgings, Sunday the 6th of February, and there wrote two letters nother words whether the had not added the borrible crime of perjury to all the enormous charges of guilt and meanneffes he had inhumanly conjured up against her; and these questions, so shocking in their purport, were pressed upon her when she was finking under her afflictions, and when the state of her health would scarcely permit me to entertain a hope that God would any longer continue to me the bleffing I had received from his bounty. I had prepared my heart for obedience to bis will; and the confummation of beglory; Was this a time for additional cruel-ties!! If I say more I may say too much.

Friday. February the eighteenth, and ther extraordinary effort was made by the IN HUMANE SOCIETY, but with what defign I have not been able to fathorn; indeed all their plots are unfathomable; but the compledien of them is distinctly to be feen fuinming on the furface of their deep ocean of contrivances .- I think it was about one or between one and two o'clock, in the afternoon, that the fervant went to the door on hearing a double knock. I had before ordered that no body but fuch as I named should at any time be admitted and no letters or note taken in that came by chairs men, the penny-polt, or family fervants notwithstanding this caution, on feeing ad ftranger who looked very like a gentlemany and who asked very civilly if Mrs. Gunnings was at home, the man who went to the door gave him admittance, and brought up his message, which was to request that when might might be allowed to see me for five minutes? I was angry with my fervant for what he had done, refused to see the man, and defired he might be told I faw no company. In a few minutes I had a fecond message. to fay that he came from Lady Lumm, and had fomething to tell me from her Ladyship. I gave no credit to this tale, but defired, if Lady Lumm had any thing particular to fay to me, she would do me the honour to fend me her commands in writing, and that the gentleman would give me no further troubles but the servant, who had let him in, did not find it quite so easy to get him out again; he infifted more than ever on feeing me, he faid he was a physician and his name Smith; that Lady Lumm, having heard I was in a very bad state of health, had wished me to confult bim; and that he waited on me at ber request. My answer was still a negative, with this addition, that I was much obliged to Lady Lumm for her goodness, and also to Doctor Smith for the trouble be had given himself, but could not accept their intended favour; being by great good fortune under the direction of a physician on whose judgement I intirely depended. Doctor

Doctor Smith, or whatever elfe was his real name, was too good an agent to thoje who had employed him to drop his designs while there was a chance of his succeeding in them; but on the last message being delivered, he appeared much disappointed and mortified, and giving up the character of a physician, he tryed to get admittance to me under that of a mediator; he faid the truth was, that he was come on the unbappy difunion that had taken place in General Gunning's family, and that if I would but fee him for five minutes, he could tell me fomething that he was fure would give me great fatisfaction, or would I tuffer him at least to fend me up a note? I would neither fee bim or receive a note from him was the answer I fent down; finding I was determined, he at last went out of the house menacing me to the servants, that I should certainly repent my obstinacy, and many expressions of elaborate and impertinent pity for the unbappy situation of poor Miss Gunning .- This was the last disturbance my pursuers could give me whilst we remained in Pall-Mall; for the next morning, Saturday the 19th, we removed to St. James's Street.

From

From the 19th to the 23d of February, whether our tormenters were themselves tired of their bard duty, and required a short respite, or whether they had not found out to what house we were removed, I am not able to decide; but we had the comfort of remaining quiet and unmolested for that little space.

On the evening of the 23d of February, a person, the respettability of whose name and character opened my doors when they were shut to others of a different discription, did me the honour of calling, and left in my hands copies of fix affidavits, fworn to by fix of General Gunning's friends .- Why a gentleman, who has the bonour of bearing his Majesty's commission, I mean Captain Bowen, and wby a gentlewoman, I mean Captain Bowen's wife, should join their names, with names fo much inferiour to their own, allowing, as on the present occasion it must be allowed, that in point of bonour and moral honesty, all inequality was done away, yet the combination of names alone can no otherwise be accounted for than by the fingularity of the case, on which their mutual services were required, and those fort of family feelings, against which bonour has no fence, nor difbonour benour any bounds; if your Grace will beflow a moment of reflection on the meffage delivered to me, with the affidavits, and which I shall state with my usual exactness, you will perceive, my Lord, I have not raised up an opinion without being able to thew that it is built on a good foundation .-In the message was contained the following proposals from General Gunning: That, if I would suppress the letter I meant to have the honour of presenting to your Grace, be would suppress the fix affidavits, the copies of which he had fent me; but on the contrary, if I perfifted, the day on which my letter was published, his collection of affidavits would be published also.

Here, indeed, is a house divided against itself; a father against his own child, and a wife against her husband; a fault must be somewhere. Let this falling house, my Lord, be examined; let the defestive part be made visible, or the whole may be destroyed. Whether the sentence falls on him or on me it is my petition that heaven will alone prop and support that part of it which has justice for its basis, and whose ornaments are truth, pity, and affection.

The

The message, sent by General Gunning and delivered to me, being a verbal one, the bearer of it received not only from my lips, but from the very foundation of my heart, to be conveyed to General Gunning, the following reply:—That I refused his proposals, and was not intimidated by his threats; that the innocence of his daughter should be exemplified, and as I was conscious the power of publishing, or surpressing, centered intirely in myself, on the penalty of my life to be forfeited, the hour before, or the hour after the publication of my letter to your Grace, I would most chearfully persist in my fixed and unalterable determination.

The next evening, the 24th, the fame person made me another visit on the same errand, and received the same answer; together with the copies of the affidavits delivered to me, with the threat of having them published, was also tied up the copies of a most curious and notable letter, produced and sworn to by my daughter's most sincere friends and dear cousins, Captain and Mrs. Bowen; to the latter of whom it was addressed by Miss Gunning at least, as does appear stated and set forth in their affidavits.—

I will

I will lay the contents of this letter before your Grace. You will have the goodness, my Lord Duke, not to insist on my producing a date to my daughter's epistle, that is not in my power to do; because when Mrs. Bowen indited it, she either forgot to give it a particular date, or, what is more likely, she thought the day and the bour when it was written would answer her purpose better; however, there are such a large family of Tuesdays in the Circle of time, that I can give your Grace no direction by which you may find out the birth of this illegitimate Tuesday produced by the Captain's Lady.

These, my Lord, are the whole of the contents of the paper before me; and I have only to intreat of your Grace, that you will compare them with Mrs. Bowen's conversation with me on Saturday the 5th of K 4

February, and with the letters delivered to me at the door of her lodgings on Sunday the 6th.

I have but the following circumstance to relate, with which at least for the present I mean to trouble your Grace.

The In-HUMANE-Society, finding my refolution of appealing to your Grace, not to be moved by common efforts, and that the bugbear affidavits, and the more contemptible letter involed with them, had not even made me change my countenance, much less my purpose: they had recourse to enterprises of fo bold a nature, as plainly bespoke the borrors they were under at the very idea of standing before your Grace in their proper colours; this deed of desperation, a gentler name it does not deserve, was attempted, but very poorly executed, on the evening of Friday the 25th of February, between the hours of feven and eight; it was the very night after I had confirmed my absolute rejection of General Gunning's proposal of suppressing the evidence against bis daughter, if I would suppress my Letter. A single knock at the Areet door did not announce the approach of visitors, visitors, it was rather the bumble fignal of conspirators and affassins; there was a heavy fall of fnow at the time. -My fervant opened the door at the infidious fummons, when Mrs. Bowen, without asking a single question, rufbed by him, and in another moment was in the room, where my fifter, my daughter, and myself, were sitting, as comfortable, and as chearful, as beaven's protection, and conscious rectitude, could make Had we feen a spettre we could not have been more shocked, or more terrified, than at the appearance of Mrs. Bowen in our apartment. My harraffed and stricken deer was the first to know her enemy, though fo disguised in her figure, that the servant who opened the door had no idea who it was, till her beroick husband followed her Actuated by the fame apprehensions and the fame terrors, we all fprung from our feats, and fled from the room, with fuch precipitation, that guilt itself could not have been winged with more swiftness. I said as I passed her, bold wicked woman! how dare you enter my house? She try'd to stop me, as the also did my fifter, who followed me; and I heard her fay, my dear Mistress Gunning, I am come as a friend, stop, for God's

God's fake! it is all a mistake. I was by this time half way up the stairs, when I heard a great battle of words between my fervant, John Dean, and the valorous Capsain Bowen; who faid he would go whereever his wife was, and John swore he should I called down to the fervants to shew them both out of the house; yet all the time making the best of my way up the stairs. Mrs. Bowen's voice was now changed from the weedling cadence of a sycophant, to the boifterous notes of an enraged fury; the only words I could distinguish in my flight, were, that we were all stark staring mad; and calling to her gentle mate, the begged he would not give himself the trouble to come up, which advice he followed; for this fimple reason, that the servant, who protected us, would not let him move a fingle step towards us. He had called at the door this very morning and asked to see us, but was denyed admittance, which I imagine was the cause of their evening exertions; their visit then was indeed but a short one; yet it occasioned us a great deal of trouble. My beloved child was fo terrified, that the continued extremely indisposed the whole night. The message, Captain Bowen left with the . fervants

Gunning's daughter and his wife was this: tell them, faid he, they will repent of their folly, I came to fave them from destruction, to-morrow will be a terrible day for them, and in three days Miss Gunning will be fent to Newgate.

This threat had exactly the fame effect on me as all the other fratagems they had used before, that is to fay, I very composedly continued to have the honour of addressing myfelf to your Grace, and have taken no other notice of their intrusion, than to forbid them by my lawyer from using the freedom to force themselves upon me, or my family, in future. This notice, I believe, rather alarmed the noble captain, as the next morning he waited on my lawyer, and very fubmissively begged to know, if the letter he had received from him the evening before was a profeffional one; and being answered that it was, he defired I might be informed I should have no more trouble from him and Mrs. Bowen.

On the evening of Monday the 28th of February, General Gunning fent a letter to his daughter, which original letter, with a copy copy of her answer, she enclosed the next morning to your Grace, and sent it under cover, directed to Mr. Ogilvie, desiring he would convey it to you.

The copies of both these letters are still my own, and I shall here lay them before your Grace, as it is impossible for me to suppose you have ever received them from Mr. Ogilvie. They were certainly entitled to some notice from your Grace; but on the contrary the virulence of her Persecutors has since that time rather increased than been diminished.

TURN'D from your doors defenceless pennyless and robb'd by you of what is and ever will be dearer than my life-my character-Stigmatized for forgeries which those who really did forge the letters and you Sir must know I am as innocent of as heaven is free from fraud you who I never in my life offended in thought word or deed to cast me out upon the wide world as a guilty creature when you know my heart would not have harboured a thought, that could have difhonoured you, myself or my fex; and after you had thrown me off to purfue me as you would the bitterest of your enemies, to raise up false witnesses to crush that child whom you should have protected with your life; innocent as I again repeat you know me to be, even had I been guilty, which God be praised I am not, still you should have fereened me, and your chastifements should have been softened by pity; you call me unfortunate, I am unfortunate; who has made me fo? This unfortunate never will appear in your presence, 'till you announce, and that in the most publick and most unequivocal manner, to the whole world, how much the has been wronged by fcandalous contrivances, and unheard of calumny.

(Signed) E. Gunning.

The insertion of these letters, my Lord, I take intirely upon myself; I do it even against the solicitations of my daughter, who, from motives of respect and delicacy, would have prevailed on me to have withheld them; but in such a plot against her, and where so many

many deceptions have been carried on, I fee the necessity of doing as I have done,

I had the honour of beginning this letter to your Grace before I moved from Pall-Mall to St. James's Street, fince which the fludied interruptions which the black ministers of darkness have industriously thrown in my way, as flumbling blocks, to impede my purpose, though not fully answering all their designs, have by no means forwarded the publication. To messengers and messages perfussive and menacing, I lay the charge of my having hitherto omitted to make one very conclusive observation, however, as it can have lost neither in weight or strength, I shall bere produce it for your Grace's inspection.

The two letters now in my possession, and which were delivered to me by Mrs. Bowen's servant, at the door of her lodging, on Sunday the 6th of February, as what gave room for her suspections of her cousin, I use her own words; these letters, my Lord Duke, have no similitude whatever to the hand writing of my daughter: now, if she had really really been the author of them, and they were addressed (as by their contents appear to be the case) in confidence, and to a confidential friend, is it possible to suppose (allow her capable of difguifing her hand which I aver she is not) that on fuch an oceasion she should disguise it; yet sign her name as she usually does fign it, E. Gunning; where could have been the inducement? this is a contingency, my Lord, against which I must doubt if the wife projectors have made any provisions, the other letter fince cooked up by the paternal and friendly affociates, a Tuesday-dated letter, like the former, I have not feen, fo cannot speak upon the merit or demerit of its imitative powers; a copy of it only has been fent to me, and that after it had received the ratification of (to the makers thereof) a trifling affidavit; but though not able to give a decided opinion, I may venture to suppose that if this smuggled Tuesday-letter is impartially examined, it will be found liable to the very same objections with the former, viz. the hand writing disguised but the name of the Supposed writer affixed to it.

By representing falls the evidences of which

which are incontrovertible, I merely perform a christian duty; for supposing I had been a franger to the party oppressed, yet being also the enemy of oppression, and the friend of justice, those facts should have been produced, every circumstance that could have detelled the criminality of that confederacy, who have abandoned themselves to the most destructive purpoles, every letter or other convicting proof, chance might have put into my posfession, should have been brought forward, as I now bring them forward, even at the rifk of my fortune, and at the hazard of my personal safety. I would have held back no truth, which it was in my power to advance, that could affift in tearing off the malk of honour from the face of guilt .- This is a christian duty! To wipe away the tears of forrow from the eyes of innocence, to give to her pallid cheek, from which it has been basely pilfered, the flush of victory, to re-plant the roses of contentment in her bosom, and present her to the world in her own white and unspotted mantle. This you is the duty of a Christian! I would not have expected praise from man, I would have asked my reward from that Master in whose fervice fervice my feeble talents were exerted Shew me, my Lord Duke, a young creature, one whom I have not the felicity to call my daughter, and I will act by ber as I have acted by my own; I will be the foother of her miseries, the supporter of her cause, and the vindicator of her bonour; but forw her to me after the very portrait of my daughter, - to bumbled in her fituation, yet so exalted in her fentiments .- So invironed by malice. yet so free from revenge. - So pursued, yet fo uncontending .- So persecuted by every possible mode of sander, yet cautiously concealing from the world circumstances, which, if made known by any other means, would be bonourable to herfelf, and cover her flanderers with eternal confusion .- So charged with meanneffes, yet possessing the very foul of dignity .- So laden with crimes, extracted from the bottomless mines of mischief, yet innocent as angels.

On the truth, the unexaggerated truth of this character, my Lord, I rest my hopes of receiving compensation in this world, and a favourable reception into that more perfect one, from which avarice, jealousy, envy, a dupliduplicines, falsehoods, forgeries, and perjuries, are for ever excluded.
